PREFACE TO THE TENTH EDITION

THE general plan remains as stated in the Preface to the Eighth Edition. Only a few modifications have to be noticed.

Many friends advised me to abandon the device of marking the additions to Professor Bell's text by square brackets, and, following the Editors of Blackstone, Smith's Leading Cases, and other English books of authority, to make no distinction between what is old and what is new. I have not thought it right to do this; but in the text I have substituted single inverted commas for square brackets, and in the notes no distinction is now made between Professor Bell's citations and remarks and mine. Where in the notes it is desired to distinguish, the internal evidence of dates, or of the matter itself, in most cases sufficiently informs the intelligent reader.

I have attempted, though not so completely as I wished, to help the reader by subdividing the longer sections by paragraphs and further sub-titles; and I have begun, what I hope my successors in editing may fully accomplish, to print the names of leading cases in blacker type. To select all the leading cases for this purpose, and thoroughly to weed out, as I also proposed to do, the references which have become useless, involved more labour and delay than could be allowed. For the present edition has been loudly demanded for several years, and I regret that even after I realised this, several unfortunate circumstances have delayed the completion of the work.

In this edition I have been greatly helped, as in the ninth, by Mr. George Guthrie, LL.B., Glasgow, for whose ability and accuracy I can securely vouch. He has almost entirely revised the portions of the book which deal with Stamp Duties, Feudal Conveyancing, Heritable Securities, Leases, Marriage, Marriage Contracts, Legacy Duty, Estate Duty; and he has also read the proof-sheets and otherwise assisted me.

PREFACE TO THE EIGHTH EDITION

IN preparing for the third time an edition of Bell's Principles of the Law of Scotland, I have adhered to the plan pursued in my former editions. I have preserved the original text, and put all additions within square brackets. There are, however, some differences in this edition which it is proper to mention.

I have endeavoured to remedy the anomaly and inconvenience of stating in the text, in the words of Professor Bell, propositions which are immediately contradicted in the notes, by turning the original into the past tense when it has been altered by subsequent legislation or decisions, or into oblique narration, when Mr. Bell's view has to be corrected. The statement of the law and its changes thus become continuous, and more easily read; and the text itself is made to show in almost all cases the present state of the law. I have thus endeavoured to make the text such a synopsis or code of the principles of the law of Scotland as the author would have given if he had been writing at the present day, and according to his original plan; or, rather, if he still survived, and were himself re-editing the book. I have, however, made fewer changes in the old text than he would probably have done.

This edition also differs from those which preceded it in the greater bulk of the additions. The 768 pages of the volume now issued correspond with 477 pages of Mr. Shaw's edition of 1860, and 473 pages of the author's last edition of 1839; being an increase of 291 and 295 pages respectively. As, however, each of these 768 pages has a line more than each page in the edition of 1860, the actual increase is equal to 309 pages. If we count in the same way, this volume exceeds by 199 pages the same portion of the last edition—that of 1876.

In the second volume the additions to the text will probably be somewhat less bulky; but it will contain a list of authorities and reports cited, and for the first time a full index of the cases cited, besides a very large number of additional entries in the index of matters.

The careful and competent reader cannot fail to observe that Professor Bell left many passages of the text in an imperfect state, and passed over, or but slightly touched on, many subjects which he would undoubtedly have desired to treat more fully in the finished work. I cannot say that I have filled up many such blanks; but the cases cited by Mr. Bell, which are not always authorities for the text, but landmarks for tracing the development of the law as it may be more fully seen in the three volumes of the Illustrations of the Law of Scotland, have in many instances been more carefully verified than in former editions, and many errors of reference have been corrected. My chief endeavour has been to present the most important results of later legislation and litigation in a convenient and accurate form, with ample reference to the authorities which students or practising lawyers may require for the fuller examination of the questions which lie within the scope of the book.

Examples of passages which have been written with difficulty and labour out of all proportion to their length, abound in the first two chapters treating of the generalia of Obligations and of Sale, as well as in subsequent chapters; e.g. the sections on Error and Fraud, Homologation and Personal Exception, Impossible and Illegal Contracts, the Measure of Damages, the Computation of Time, the Wrongful Use of Diligence, Restrictions on Buildings in Feu-Contracts, Obligations to Relieve of Public Burdens, and many other subjects; while in the incorporation of the Bills of Exchange Act and the late Conveyancing Acts, and of the great mass of recent decisions on the Law of Companies, Shipping, and other branches of Mercantile Law, I cannot hope altogether to have overcome the difficulty of giving a correct summary of what is new, and at the same time making it harmonise in some degree with the original arrangement.

No one, indeed, can be more aware than I am of many omissions and defects; but only those who have been engaged in work of the same kind can rightly estimate the labour and difficulty with which the shortest statements of the law in such a book are frequently attended; and the sense of responsibility with which, in a new issue of the most familiar handbook of every Scots lawyer, such statements are submitted to the public.

For such labour and responsibility there is in general, as the life of Professor Bell himself proved, no adequate reward, except those which grow out of the work itself, and such as may be found in the indulgent appreciation of the learned and liberal profession for whose use the book is mainly intended.

PREFATORY NOTE TO MR. SHAW'S EDITION

GEORGE JOSEPH BELL was born in Edinburgh on the 26th of March 1770. He was the third son of the Reverend William Bell, a clergyman of the Episcopal communion. He was educated in Edinburgh, or, more correctly, was to a great extent self-taught. On the 19th of November 1791 he was admitted to the Bar, and in 1805 he married the eldest daughter of Charles Shaw, Esq., Ayr (a). He was unanimously elected by the Faculty of Advocates, on the 2nd of February 1822, Professor of the Law of Scotland in the University of Edinburgh. The motion was made by John Clerk of Eldin, then Leader of the Bar, and was seconded by Sir Walter Scott.

Soon afterwards, he issued, for the use of the Students, "Outlines" of his lectures. In 1829 he was induced to give them more extensive circulation, by publishing them under the title of "Principles of the Law of Scotland." He dedicated the book to the Students, expressing a "hope that it would render their study of a very difficult science more easy, by supplying them with a brief statement of the leading rules and exceptions, and a correct list of the authorities relied on in support of the several propositions, or useful in illustrating them" (b). This, which forms the first edition of the work, contained only about nine hundred sections; but it was greatly enlarged in the second edition, published in 1830, which embraced upwards of two thousand four hundred sections, and a large additional number of authorities. The popularity and the utility of the work were shown by a new edition being called for in three years thereafter; and this was followed by the publication, in 1839, of a fourth edition.

Still more to aid the studies of his pupils, Mr. Bell published, in 1836 and 1838, "Illustrations of the Principles of the Law of Scotland," in three volumes,—a work of much labour and of great utility.

He died in September 1843. In the interval, he had devoted all the time he could spare from the performance of public duties to the preparation of a new edition of his "Commentaries on the Laws of Scotland." On that work he had made large alterations, which are embodied in the edition which I lately published (c). He had, however, left untouched the

(a) His youngest brother, Sir Charles Bell, the well-known anatomist, married the second daughter of Mr. Shaw.

(b) In consulting the authorities, the origin and object of the work should be kept in view. Sometimes they appear adverse to the doctrine in the text; but this was pointed out and formed the subject of comment in the Lectures.

(c) From my connection with Mr. Bell (brother-in-law), I was on the most intimate and confidential footing with him. I assisted him in carrying through the press the fifth edition of his "Commentaries," and the later editions of the "Principles." On his death, his manuscripts were entrusted to me.

“Principles”; and in this edition the text stands as in the last. The only alterations are, that the work is now divided into books and chapters; that many of the divisions and subdivisions in the sections (which tended somewhat to perplex) have been omitted; and that a few of the sections have been thrown together, in order to bring similar or analogous doctrines into immediate juxtaposition (a).

(a) These may be seen in the table of corresponding sections at the end of the work, marked by a circumflex. It became necessary, for that and other reasons, to make some alteration on the numbers of the sections. These are shown in the table.

CHARLOTTE SQUARE, April 1860.

[Note.—An interesting notice of Professor Bell by the late Lord Justice-Clerk Moncreiff may be found in the “Edinburgh Review” for April 1872, and is quoted in the “Journal of Jurisprudence,” vol. xvi. p. 428.]

ADVERTISEMENT TO THE FOURTH EDITION

I HAVE made important additions to the text of this edition. Since the former edition was published, many decisions have been pronounced, both here and in England, greatly affecting the doctrines and rules of Law; and several statutes have been passed, by which changes have been made both in legal doctrine and in matters of form. I have endeavoured, in a careful revisal, to incorporate this new matter in the present edition, in fulfilment of that duty which is most especially necessary in what is meant for Students and the younger part of the profession.

In this work, and in three volumes of Illustrations, I have completed my original design. My purpose was to exhibit for the use of Students, and for the sudden occasions of practice, a concise and clear statement of the principles and rules of the Law, with proofs and illustrations from decided cases of their practical application in the actual business of the Bar. And I am happy to learn that, in the opinion of the profession, I have in some measure accomplished my object.

INTRODUCTION

1. The object of Jurisprudence is the protection and enforcement of Civil Rights; and the system is perfect or imperfect, in proportion as the doctrine of Rights is regulated on sound principles and enlarged views of the happiness of men, and as the means of protecting and vindicating them are well or ill provided.

The Civil Jurisprudence of Scotland comprehends, first, a knowledge of the rules and exceptions relative to Civil Rights, with the grounds on which they rest; and secondly, the application of those rules and exceptions to judicial determinations for the protection or enforcement of right.

2. Right, in Jurisprudence, differs from Right in Morals, in so far as the latter term is used to express what ought to be; while the former expresses that which, as belonging to a person, he may vindicate by judicial aid.

Rights of this latter species may be distinguished into—1. Those which relate to Property or Things external,—as land, moveables, goods, money, debts, estates, and effects of all kinds; and, 2. Those which relate to the Person,—the safety, liberty, and reputation of men.

3. Of the Rights relative to Property, another division has been made by lawyers,—into those which depend upon the engagement or obligation of the person to give the thing, or to make it available to another, in perpetual or temporary use; and those in which, by immediate connection with the thing itself, without the intervention of another, it is said to belong to the person. Rights of the former kind are sometimes termed Personal Rights relative to things, being available only by demand against a particular person. Rights of the latter kind are called Real Rights, and are available against the thing itself, in whose hands soever it may be found. The former the Roman lawyers called ‘Jura ad Rem,’ the latter ‘Jura in Re’; and the distinction is very important in practical jurisprudence (a).

(a) 2 Stair, 1. § 1. 3 Ersk. 1. § 2. Pothier, Tr. de Propriété, § 245. 7.

4. The doctrine of Rights may be explained in the following order :—

Book I. Rights Personal; arising from Obligation or Contract Express or Implied.

Book II. Rights Real; in Property, Heritable and Moveable.

Book III. Rights arising from Marriage and the Constitution of a family; with the laws of Succession.

Book IV. Rights relative to the Person.

Book V. The Evidence and Enforcement of these Rights.

5. Nature and Kinds of Obligations.—One has a Right to demand of another person a thing or the use of it, or the services of that other person, in virtue of an engagement to deliver the thing or to perform the service. The counterpart of rights thus derived through personal engagement is OBLIGATION. Such obligations are either unilateral or mutual; the former being strictly called OBLIGATIONS, the latter CONTRACTS. The peculiarities of mutual obligations will be explained hereafter (a); but whether the right in question arises from a unilateral or from a mutual agreement, Obligation or Engagement is the essential point (b).

(a) See below, § 70.

(b) 3 Ersk. 1. § 2.

6. Obligation is express or implied; the former being Conventional, the latter what some lawyers have called Obediential.

7. Definition of Conventional Obligation.—A Conventional Obligation is an engagement or undertaking to deliver, or to pay, or to do, or to abstain from doing, something; conferring on him to whom the engagement is undertaken, a right to demand performance of it (a).

Three separate acts of the will, terminating in such engagement, have been distinguished: deliberation; resolution; engagement. It is the Engagement only which law will enforce (b).

(a) 1 Stair, 10. § 1, 2. 3 Ersk. 2. § 3. Pothier, Tr. des Oblig. p. 2. Toullier, tom. 6. p. 1 et seq. See Instit. de Oblig. lib. 3. tit. 14.

8. Promise and Offer.—A promise is an engagement (to which no preceding consideration is, by the law of Scotland, essential) to give, or deliver, or pay, or do, or abstain (a). It may be either absolute or conditional (b). It is binding if undertaken as a final engagement; but not if mentioned only as a probable intention (c). It may be proved by writing; or by oath (d); or even by witnesses, when followed by rei interventus, or 'except in the case of cautionry,' when forming part of a bargain of moveables (e). But a promise may be discharged by rejection express or implied; or by the failure of any annexed condition (f).

(a) The law of Scotland does not, on the one hand, follow the Roman law of nudum pactum (Pand. Justin. Pothier, lib. 2. tit. 14); nor recognise the subtleties of the English and American law, on the other. 1 Plowden, 308. 2 Blackst. 445. Rann v. Hughes, 7 Term Rep. 350, note. Pillans v. (f) 1 Stair, 10. § 4. Allan v. Colzier, 1664, M. 9428; 1 Ill. 82.

9. A promise differs from an offer, as being a unilateral engagement, to which acceptance is presumed; while an offer is always and in terminis conditional, raised into an obligation only by acceptance (a).

(a) 1 Stair, 10. § 4. 3 Ersk. 3. § 88. See below, § 73.

10. Nature and Requisites of Consent.—To a perfect obligation (besides the proof requisite), it is necessary that there shall be a deliberate and voluntary consent and purpose to engage; excluding, on the one hand, Incapacity by nonage, disease, or imbecility (a); and, on the other, Error, Force, and Fraud.

(a) See as to this below, § 2065-2113.

11. (1.) Error 'has in itself no legal effect. It becomes operative on a man's legal position only in exceptional cases (a). If, for example, he buys too dear or sells too cheap, he is not by reason of his mistake protected from loss (b). Hence, in written agreements, where consent is not doubtful or disputed, obvious mistakes and omissions are to be corrected from the general meaning or context, and even more serious mistakes may be set right if the instrument itself afford the means of doing so; or, being latent or mere clerical errors, by the appropriate extrinsic evidence (c). Error is operative only when it prevents an act or deed from being done or executed, or an agreement from being concluded, according to the true intention of the actor or grantor or contracting parties. The effects in such cases are: that obligations and contracts are annulled or dissolved on the ground either of essential error (§ 11), or of error produced by misrepresentation or fraud (§ 13 sqq.); testamentary writings are avoided on like grounds (§ 1864); and what has actually been paid or delivered in error may be recovered back (§ 531).'

Error in substantials, whether in fact or in law, invalidates consent, 'or rather excludes real consent,' where reliance is placed on the thing mistaken (d). Such error in substantials may be—1. In relation to the subject of the contract or obligation; as when one commodity is mistaken for another (e); 2. In relation to the person who undertakes the engagement, or to whom it is supposed to be undertaken, wherever personal identity is essential (f); 3. In relation to the price or consideration for the undertaking (g); 4. In relation to the quality, 'quantity, or extent' of the thing engaged for, if expressly or tacitly essential to the bargain (h); or 5. In relation to the nature of the contract itself supposed to be entered into, 'as, for example, if one sign a conveyance believing it to be a bond or security or a testamentary deed (i), or a bill believing it to be a guarantee (k), or even a deed under the mistaken belief induced by the other party that it contains material clauses which were in the draft (l), or does not contain clauses which are concealed or improperly added afterwards (m), or has a legal effect different from that which it really has (n).'

'It is an important question not yet fully answered by decisions how far an error of one party only will give him a right to rescind a contract or onerous unilateral obligation. It has been laid down in the House of Lords that, in the case of an onerous contract reduced to writing, the erroneous belief of one of the contracting parties in regard to the nature of the obligations which he has undertaken, does not give him this right, unless it has been induced by the representations, whether fraudulent or not, of the other party (n).

'The legal effect of ignorance and error is the same, ignorance being in truth the generic term and including error (o). In a narrower sense, ignorance excludes the idea of reliance on the thing mistaken, and may go rather to affect the construction of an obligation than to invalidate it; e.g. a general discharge does not include claims competent to the granter, of which he was ignorant at the time. (See below, § 584, note.) And where the intention is to sell the whole interest under a succession, or all the stock in certain premises, the seller has no redress (both parties having been in ignorance) if he afterwards find that there were claims as to which he was ignorant (p), or that certain boxes forming one of the lots put up to auction contained valuable commodities (q).'

Although error in law as well as error in fact will invalidate a contract, it will not always entitle to restitution after the contract is fulfilled or money paid (r). 'There is no Scots authority impugning the proposition, that a mistake of law invalidates a contract when its existence excludes real consent. But it has been held in England that the rule ignorantia juris neminem excusat applies to cases of error in contracts as well as to payments of money in error (s). The application of the general rule, however, has, in practice, been much restricted; and it may almost be said that the preceding proposition is practically in harmony with English law, as now explained. It is held that the principle "ignorantia," etc., applies only to ignorance of the general law of the country, and not to ignorance or error as to private rights, or mistake as to the mutual and respective rights of the parties to a contract: all mistakes, in short, as to the application of the law to particular circumstances being regarded, when they are an essential element in an apparent agreement or contract, as errors of fact (t).'

It is here necessary to distinguish a fundamental error from a mistake as to a collateral fact, or mistake in motive on the part of one of the parties, which has no effect, but must be made the subject of warranty. Hardy v. Austin & M'Aslan, 1870; 8 Macph. 798. 12. (2.) Force and Fear ('Anglice, Duress') annul engagement, when not vain or foolish fear, but such as to overpower a mind of ordinary firmness (a); or such as, applied to a person of weaker age, sex, or condition, will produce the effect of overpowering violence on a firmer mind (b). Among the instruments of force and fear which have been held to annul engagement, are, threats and terror of death; pain to oneself, or parent, or child (c); infamy and disgrace; imprisonment, when employed to obtain an advantage beyond the lawful object of it (d); and even loss of property (e). But mere vexation and inconvenience (as the threat of a lawsuit), 'or fear of the lawful consequences of refusing to do what is asked, e.g. of imprisonment (f),' will not be sufficient.

13. (3.) Fraud is a machination or contrivance to deceive, and annuls (a) obligations induced by it (b). There is in such obligations apparently consent and engagement, but not such as the party defrauding is entitled to rely upon (c). Fraud is either such as gives rise, or leads, to the engagement; without which the engagement would not have taken place: Or such as is only incident to or an accompaniment of a contract, in which, independently of it, the parties were engaged (d). Error by fraud of the former kind, though not in substantials (e), if induced by stratagem sufficient to deceive a person of ordinary capacity; or accompanied by imbecility and loss on the part of the obligor (f); or induced in a case in which the obligor relies on the obligee for his information, as in insurance contracts (g); will ground an action for reducing the contract, or an exception in defence against an action grounded on it: 'while, the author wrote,' error by fraud of the latter kind will give relief by damages only. 'Yet, in general there must be material fraud (dans locum contractui) even to found an action for damages, so that the distinction, if it be at all recognised in modern practice, is of little moment, except as indicating that fraud of the latter kind has no effect (h).'

There is an important distinction between fraud of the contracting party, and fraud of a third party, in which the contracting party does not participate. The former entitles the obligor to redress by exception or by reduction; the latter directs his remedy against the third party (i).

13A. 'An obligation induced by fraud (in the absence of essential error) is not void, but only voidable in the election of the party (a) defrauded, provided (1) that he is able to restore the party against whom he seeks relief to the same position in which he was at the time of the transaction challenged, (2) that no third parties have in good faith and for value acquired rights under the contract, and (3), in some cases, that the position of the wrong-doer himself has not been materially changed by delay in challenging the contract (b). If it is impossible to restore things to their original condition, the party defrauded, instead of rescinding the contract, may obtain relief in damages (c). It is a result of the rule, that an obligation originating in or tainted by fraud is valid till reduced, that innocent third parties may, while it is unchallenged, acquire for onerous causes rights in regard to it which cannot be set aside (d). But even third parties cannot take benefit from a fraudulent transaction if they have acquired their rights gratuitously (quod nemo debet locupletari jactura aliena), or with notice of the fraud (e), or if they represent the fraudulent bankrupt (f).'

14. Fraud may be by false representation (a) 'made to another, or to the public, with the intention that it shall be acted upon, and so as to cause damage to be incurred (b), of material facts (e) known by the party making it to be untrue, or not believed by him to be true, i.e. with reckless ignorance whether it is true or false (d); but not of matters honestly believed by the party making the statements to be true (e), or of matters as to which the person said to be misled could and did exercise his own judgment (f); or by concealment of material circumstances (g) 'provided that by the nature of the contract and the position of the parties, a duty of communication is incumbent on the creditor, or the concealment is active and industrious'; or by underhand dealing (h); or by means of intoxication (i); or of imbecility (k).

'Duty of Disclosure.—There is a duty of disclosure, varying in degree according to circumstances, in insurance contracts (infra, § 474, 514, 522), in cautionry or suretyship (infra, § 251, 289, 291, 301), in contracts to take shares in companies (infra, § 403B), in family settlements and arrangements (l). It is sometimes a difficult question whether mere silence as to an error of the other party is sufficient to avoid a contract. If it be not an essential error making the contract void ab initio (m), and if the parties are treating at arms' length as in ordinary sales (see § 96, etc.), it is held that there is no duty of disclosure, no obligation on the one party to correct a mistake of the other to which he has not contributed (n). "Either party may be innocently silent as to grounds open to both to exercise their judgment upon" (o).

"Active Concealment" is virtually misrepresentation, as when one uses devices to conceal the defects of articles sold (p), or having innocently caused a misapprehension, fails to correct it when he discovers the error (q), or keeps silence as to facts which if disclosed would alter the whole effect of what he has stated (r).

NOTE relative to sections 11, 12, and 13.—The want of consent where the obligation proceeds from error or force annuls the contract; but the nullity must be declared judicially. The contract ostensibly is valid and regular, and—1. It subsists till it be reduced; 'and the Court will not reform the contract in accordance with the real intention of the parties, but will reduce it, subject, it may be, to conditions as to restitution or recompense (s).' 2. 'The objection on the ground of error or force (t)' will be effectual against third parties without notice; under the exception of land or heritable securities acquired on the faith of the records, moveables corporeal, and bills and notes.

A distinction has been taken in the case of fraud, that it will not be effectual as a ground of reduction against third parties; seeing there is here consent, though proceeding on a false ground. 'The author asked,' is there any real ground for such a distinction? 'But as it is a fixed principle that a contract obtained by fraud is not void, but voidable, and so is valid till rescinded, it is now settled that a contract cannot be rescinded for fraud after innocent third parties have acquired rights under it for value (u).'

(c) This includes misrepresentations known to be untrue as to matters of law (at least within the limits now settled in regard to error, § 11); and the cases sometimes supposed to exclude such misrepresentations from the ordinary rule only show that fraud is there less easily established, because it is generally the business of one party as much as of the other to know the law; e.g. if a man be acquainted with the contents of a writing, it will require pregnant proof of fraud to show that he has been misled as to its legal effect. (e) I.e. an innocent misrepresentation (not leading to essential error and not being a warranty) does not invalidate a contract; in other words, a representation, false in fact but not known to be so by the party making it, who honestly believes it to be true, is not fraud in law. *Brownlie v. R. 8 Ex. 132. 56 & 57 Vict. c. 71, s. 2 (Sale of Goods Act, 1893). No case appears to have decided that a contract made in a state of complete incapacity from drunkenness is ab initio void, and the opinions in Matthews v. Baxter, and perhaps in Pollok v. Burns, indicate that it is only voidable. It is difficult to suppose a case of intoxication avoiding a deed without some degree of fraud, but such cases may occur, especially if both parties are the worse of drink, where there is such a degree of intoxication as to make one utterly incapable of entering into business transactions (see Johnston v. Clark and Taylor v. Provan, cit.). In all cases the party seeking relief will be barred from pleading his intoxication, unless he makes his challenge as soon as he comes to his senses and knows what he is said to have done (Pollok

v. Burns, cit.). It seems that he may ratify the agreement, and that the other party who contracted with him, knowing his condition, may be held to his bargain (Pollock on Contr. 90). But if both were drunk, quære? The cases of Jardine and Hunter, cit., show that drunkenness may merely be an element in proving that the parties did not really intend to make a serious bargain.

14A. 'Facility and Circumvention. Contracts and deeds are reduced on the ground of "facility and fraud or circumvention," when they have been obtained by artifice or fraud practised upon persons, who though not insane or even (strictly speaking) imbecile, are of a weak and facile disposition by reason of age, disease, or congenital infirmity (a). Circumvention and fraud seem to be just two shades of the same thing (b). Facility and lesion (i.e. damage) without fraud or circumvention, are not grounds for setting aside obligations (c).

14B. 'Undue Influence as a ground for setting aside deeds and agreements borders closely on facility and circumvention. In England, Courts of equity give relief in all cases where advantages have been procured by one party by the use of influence of any kind, which appears to be inconsistent with the exercise of free and deliberate judgment by the other. It has been said that "the principle applies to every case where influence is acquired and abused, and where confidence is reposed and betrayed" (a). In Scotland, it has been held that undue influence invalidates deeds and contracts where a relation exists which imports confidence or imposes a duty of protection. Perhaps it might be correctly said that the existence of such a relation only operates, where there is no facility, to create a presumption of fraud or unfairness (or error?) (b). To support this ground of reduction, there must be not only inadequacy of consideration, but subjection to a dominant influence and abuse of confidence; and it is often of importance that the person seeking relief had no independent legal adviser (c).'

15. Proof of Consent.—In order to distinguish the requisites of final and conclusive engagement in different situations, contracts have been arranged into Consensual; Real; Written.

16. (1.) Consensual Contracts, strictly speaking, are those in which mere consent proved by writing, by witnesses, or by confession, is sufficient to establish the obligation; as sale, barter, or location of moveables; mandate; and partnership. But every obligation to which writing is not indispensable, is effectual where consent is proved (a).

(a) 1 Stair, 10. § 11. 3 Ersk. 3. § 1.

17. (2.) Real Contracts require to their completion as such, an act of delivery or possession; as, loan, commodate, deposit, pledge. But the consent alone will bind the party to complete the contract (a).

(a) 1 Stair, 10. § 11. 3 Ersk. 1. § 17.

18. Written Contracts, in strict technical language, are those to which authentic written evidence is required, not merely in proof, but in solemnity; as, obligations relative to land; or obligations agreed to be reduced to writing; or those required by statute to be in writing. On other occasions, writing is required only in evidence; as in promises to pay money, or 'formerly' in cautionary obligations, and so may be supplied by oath, or admission of the party (a).

(a) 1 Stair, 10. § 11; also § 9. 3 Ersk. 2. § 1, 2. See below, § 249A, as to cautionary obligations.

19. Written obligations and contracts may be distinguished into three classes: Attested, Holograph, and Privileged (a).

(1.) Attested Writings are subscribed by the granter, either in presence of two witnesses, or acknowledged to them by him: Or if the granter cannot write, by two notaries subscribing for him, duly authorised so to do (orally and symbolically) before four witnesses, 'but since 1st Oct. 1874, by one notary before two witnesses.' The witnesses subscribe, adding the word "witness" in attestation of the party's subscription, or of that of the notaries as duly authorised by the party. The writing bears a clause attesting the fact of the subscription of the party (or notaries) and witnesses, and expressly 'mentioned until 1st Oct. 1874' the name and designation of the writer of the deed, and of the witnesses; and the parties and witnesses are by their subscription held to attest the contents of this clause (b).

(a) These will be hereafter more particularly discussed as part of the Law of Evidence (see below, § 2225 et seq.); at present a general statement is sufficient.

(b) See below, § 2226, and 37 and 38 Vict. c. 94, § 39-41 (Conveyancing Act, 1874).

20. (2.) Holograph Writings are wholly or in the essential parts (a) written by the party, and subscribed by him (b). 'The privileges of a holograph writing are extended to documents which though not holograph are clearly adopted by, or by reference imported into, a holograph writing (c). Writing in a firm's name holograph of a partner is holograph of the firm (d).' They are held equivalent to attested writings, in affording proof at once of authenticity and of deliberate engagement. But they are probative only during twenty years (e). They do not at any time prove their own date, 'except against the party issuing them (f)'; but to that effect must be attested by instrumentary witnesses (g). 'The burden of proving that a writing is holograph of the alleged grantor lies on the person who founds on it (h). It is said that a statement in the writing itself that it is holograph, is prima facie evidence of the fact, and throws the onus on the party challenging it (i). But such a presumption can be of little value, and is important chiefly in non-contentious cases in the Commissary Court (k).'

(a) 4 Stair, 42, § 6. Lawrie v. Lawrie, 1859; 21 D. 240.

(b) But see 4 Stair, 42, § 16. M. Bell's Conv. i. 82, and Currence v. Hacket, and other cases cited below, § 1868. Writings subscribed by two or more persons, but holograph only of one of them, are obligatory only against the writer. Miller v. Farquharson, 1835; 13 S. 838. Sproul v. Wilson, 1809; Hume, 920.

21. (3.) Privileged Writings are such as law sanctions, although defective in some of the proofs or solemnities necessary in attested or holograph writings. So Last Wills, from peculiar favour, and from respect to the tranquillity of dying persons, are sustained, although subscribed only by one notary (or a 'parish' clergyman acting as such) and two witnesses (a); and Mercantile Writings are effectual, although neither attested nor holograph, on account of the rapidity which may be necessary in preparing them, the immediate use to which they are to be applied, and the interests of merchants, who are often unacquainted with the peculiar usages of Scotland. Bills, notes, bank-cheques, orders, mandates, guarantees, 'receipts, fitted accounts,' and letters in re mercatoria, fall under this rule (b). 'The privilege does not extend to writings unconnected or but remotely connected with trade (c). Landlord's discharges for rent are valid by usage if only subscribed by the landlord or his factor (d).'

22. (4.) The Stamp Laws, of which the primary object is revenue, although not intended to regulate the proof of contracts and obligations, indirectly affect it; and in questions of evidence as to the authenticity of writings, the chronology of the Stamp Acts (as well as the paper mark) may be of importance (a). The general rules 'given in former editions are much modified by legislation, the whole system of stamp laws having been revised and consolidated by the Act of 1870, which again has been superseded by the Act of 1891 (b); and in revising this section it has appeared expedient to omit some of the general rules taken from earlier statutes.

'The rules' are—1. A stamp is required in all agreements, 'except those' which admit of pecuniary estimation, 'and relate to matters not of the value of £5'; not being for the hire of a labourer, 'artificer, manufacturer, or menial' servant (c); nor a memorandum, letter, or agreement for or relating to the sale of goods, 'wares, or merchandise (d); nor an agreement or memorandum between masters and mariners for wages on a coasting voyage from port to port in the United Kingdom (e); nor an instrument of apprenticeship of a poor child by the parish or a public charity, or under any statute for regulating parish apprentices (f); nor a special pawn ticket (g). The Act, under special heads, expressly exempts from duty certain bank-notes, drafts, warrants, coupons, etc. (h); excise bonds for drawback on goods to be exported (i); receipts for money not amounting to £2; and certain receipts by bankers and public officers; receipts by seamen, soldiers, etc., for State pay; receipts for the price of and dividends on public stock, or for the contents of exchequer bills, etc.; receipts for the contents endorsed on duly stamped instruments, etc. (k); receipts for goods by inland carriers, and weight-notes issued with duly stamped warrants and relating solely to the same goods (l). The following instruments fall under the express general exemptions from stamp duty—transfers of shares in the Government or Parliamentary stocks or funds; dispositions or mortgages of ships, or shares therein; agreements made in the United Kingdom for service as artificer, clerk, domestic servant, handicraftsman, mechanic, gardener, servant in husbandry, or labourer, in any British colony or possession abroad; testaments and dispositions mortis causa in Scotland (m).'

2. 'Unstamped or insufficiently stamped instruments may (unless express provision to the contrary is made by the Stamp Act) be stamped on payment of the unpaid duty and a penalty of £10, and also, where the unpaid duty exceeds £10, interest at 5 per cent.; but the Commissioners of Inland Revenue have power at any time to mitigate or remit the penalty. Deeds first executed abroad are, for thirty days after receipt in the United Kingdom, stamped on payment of the unpaid duty only; and certain instruments liable to ad valorem duty may be afterstamped, without penalty, within thirty days after their first execution (n). Policies of sea insurance may be afterstamped on payment of a penalty of £100 (o). Inland bills and notes, and 'bills of lading' require a stamp so absolutely, that it cannot afterwards be supplied (p). 3. No stamp duty is imposed unless the words of the Act clearly apply to the specific description of transaction (q). 'And the question whether any and what stamp duty is chargeable is determined by the real substance and effect of the deed, and not by a critical view of its particular words, or even by the description given of it in the instrument by the parties themselves (r).'

4. Stamps of a denomination applicable to the particular instrument shall be effectual though of greater value than required; 'but a stamp which, by any word on the face of it, is appropriated to any particular description of instrument, is not available for an instrument of any other description. And an instrument to which a particular stamp is appropriated is not duly stamped unless it has such a stamp (s). Stamp duties and postage duties to the extent of 2s. 6d. may, however, be denoted by the same stamps, when unappropriated adhesive stamps are allowed (t).'

5. The agreement duty is sufficiently complied with if affixed to any one of a series of letters making the contract (u). 6. However numerous the parties, one stamp is sufficient when the instrument relates to one subject-matter, as to a security by several co-obligants for all the debts of a bankrupt (v); but where the transactions are different, the stamp will validate only one of them (w). 'Several instruments upon the same paper must be separately stamped (x).'

7. An action raised on an unstamped instrument, which may by the Act be stamped ex post facto, 'may be' sisted till the stamp be procured (y); 'and in any case upon the production of such a deed in a civil action or submission, the stamp duty and penalty, with £1 further, may be paid to the clerk of Court or arbiter (z), and' when 'the stamp is' adhibited, 'or such payment made,' the whole proceedings on the instrument are held to be retrospectively rendered unexceptionable (aa). 'It is pars judicis to notice the omission of a stamp (bb). 8. When secondary evidence of the contents of a lost document is admissible, there is a presumption omnia rite esse acta, and therefore that the deed was stamped, unless evidence be given to the contrary; but if it is proved to have been unstamped at any time after execution, the onus is shifted, and the party who relies on it must prove that it was stamped at some future time (cc). 9. The stamp duties apply to instruments executed in the United Kingdom, or relating, wheresoever executed, to any property situate, or to any matter or thing done or to be done, in any part of the United Kingdom. But unstamped or insufficiently stamped deeds are admissible in criminal proceedings (dd), or for a collateral purpose, such as to prove a fraud (ee). And it seems the better opinion, that when a deed is excluded by the Stamp Acts, parole evidence, if otherwise competent, may be admitted to prove the agreement or facts to which it referred, just as if it did not exist (ff). An unstamped document which combines two characters or purposes, requiring a stamp in regard to one and not in regard to the other, is admissible in evidence in the latter character for any purpose unconnected with the first (gg). 10. It has been held in various matters that our Courts do not take notice of the revenue laws of foreign countries, so that writings executed abroad, and void there for want of stamps, are admissible in our Courts (hh); yet where the local law is not a mere law of procedure, but makes the stamp necessary to the validity of the instrument, our Courts will give effect to the foreign law, if it be the law of the contract (ii). 11. Bare offers and proposals not accepted in writing and not proving a concluded contract are generally admissible in evidence without being stamped, such as estimates for work, the prospectus of a school, unsigned conditions of lease, offers of salary, or payment for work or services, though acted upon (kk). Mere admissions or acknowledgments, or authorities not themselves amounting to evidence of a contract, are also admitted in evidence although unstamped (ll).

23. (5.) Delivery of Written Deed.—The general rule is, that an obligation in writing, in order to be effectual, must be delivered to the obligee, or a third party for him, in token of complete engagement (a). Questions of delivery of writings occur chiefly in relation to deeds of succession and provision. In ordinary contracts and obligations there is seldom room for the question, unless in those cases in which several obligants are concerned.

Delivery does not (as in England) require any ceremony; the fact of the deed being in the obligee's or in neutral custody, or recorded in a public register, or followed by sasine, being sufficient in the ordinary case to infer delivery (b). In doubtful cases, one's agent is as himself; so possession by the granter's agent is not delivery (c). Possession by the grantee's agent is; and if he be agent for both, the presumption is for delivery (d). A neutral person is presumed to hold for the creditor, when the bond is for a consideration given; for the debtor, when the bond is gratuitous (e). The presumption as to time is, that delivery took place at the date (f).

24. The general rule suffers exception in testaments; in mutual contracts (a); where, by a clause in the deed, delivery is dispensed with (b); where the granter is the natural custodian for the obligee, as parents for their children (c). And where the granter is himself interested to detain the deed, it is 'if onerous' good without delivery (d). The presumption 'arising from the grantee's possession of the writ' may be overcome by evidence; 'or rather, in most cases, delivery is a fact to be proved by evidence such as will satisfy a jury (e).'

25. Locus Pœnitentiæ (a corollary to the rule of final engagement) is a power of resiling from an incomplete engagement; from an unaccepted offer (a); from a mutual contract to which all have not assented (b); from an obligation to which writing is requisite (c), or has been stipulated (d), and has not yet been adhibited in an authentic shape (e); from a marriage which, by marriage-contract, is agreed to be afterwards solemnised (f).

The principle is, that the final assent is not yet given, so that a reference to oath is no answer to the plea of locus pœnitentiæ (g). But it is necessary, where writing is stipulated, to distinguish whether it be the intention of parties thereby to suspend the engagement, or to bind the parties in the meanwhile: There is locus pœnitentiæ in the former case; not in the latter (h). 'It is a matter of construction in the circumstances of each case whether there is a final agreement; and while the mere reference in letters to a future formal agreement does not necessarily prevent these letters from constituting a final bargain (i), it is generally evidence tending to show that the parties did not yet intend to be bound (k).' In marriage - contracts, although there is locus pœnitentiæ from the marriage, the obligation is so far binding as to give action for damage if not fulfilled (l).

26. Rei Interventus raises a personal exception, which excludes the plea of locus pœnitentiæ (a). It is inferred from any proceedings not unimportant on the part of the obligee, known to and permitted by the obligor to take place on the faith of the contract as if it were perfect (b); provided they are unequivocally referable to the agreement, and productive of alteration of circumstances, loss, or inconvenience, though not irretrievable (c). 'This sentence has been repeatedly recognised as a correct statement of the law (d); but it must be added that the knowledge or permission of the obligor is not necessarily actual knowledge or express permission, for one who signs and gives forth an imperfect contract knowing that the other party relies on it, must be held to have assented to his acting upon it in the way contemplated (e).'

27. Homologation (in principle similar to rei interventus) is an act 'of the obligor or his legal representative (a)' approbatory of a preceding engagement, which in itself is defective or informal 'or unauthorised,' either confirming or adopting it as binding. It may be express, or inferred from circumstances (b). It must be absolute, and not compulsory, nor proceeding on error or fraud, and unequivocally referable to the engagement; and must imply assent to it, with full knowledge of its extent (c), and of all the relative interests of the homologator (d). It establishes the engagement 'not' as if granted at the date of the homologation, 'but from the beginning (e).' Homologation may be by the obligor, otherwise imperfectly bound (f); or by another having an interest adverse to the obligation (g). It sanctions the whole obligation (unless fairly divisible into parts), according to its true nature and meaning (h); and bars the homologator and his representatives, not third parties in competition (i). It may be effectual to sanction even deeds which are null by defect in form, provided they have been granted by persons not incapable (k); and it may operate as a bar against 'or imply waiver of' a claim of damage for breach of contract (l). 'When rei interventus is founded upon as varying a formal written deed, it operates by showing that a contravention of it has been permitted; and thus, as in a lease, excludes an action of damages for breach of contract or a decree for specific performance. It may be, strictly speaking, that it does not in any case abrogate a condition of the written deed, though in some cases the effect is practically the same. The permitted deviation infers discharge of a condition of the lease, only so far as it unequivocally requires such an inference;—a licence to a tenant to do certain things forbidden by his lease does not necessarily imply, even when long continued, consent to his continuing to do them all through the lease (m).

'Adoption of Null Deeds.—When a deed or obligation is intrinsically null; e.g. if it be granted by a pupil or insane person, or be forged, homologation or subsequent approbation operates only as the adoption of what is reduced to an intelligible and precise shape, and its binding effect has in this case no retrospect (n). But there is no reason why adoption should not be so conceived as to be retrospective.'

Shepherd*, 1847; 6 Bell's App. 153, 173; supra (a)); and the so-called homologation by "one having an adverse interest" falls more correctly under the head of subsequent adoption or confirmation of an agent's act (see e.g. Grant v. Baillie, 1830; 8 S. 606); or of personal exception, see § 27A; and comp. 1 Bell's Com. 145 (140, M'L.'s ed.).

27A. 'There is no authority for saying that in the law of Scotland the acts from which homologation is inferred must be such as to prejudice the party pleading it, or to lead him to alter his position. On the contrary, they are such acts of the obligor as imply distinct and unequivocal consent; and, it may perhaps be said, such as make it unfair or contrary to good conscience to hold that he is not bound. Rei interventus, however, indicates a change of the obligee's position, made by him upon the faith of the obligation, raising a personal exception (a).

'Personal Exception.—The principle of personal bar, personal objection, or personal exception, like homologation, acquiescence, or waiver, from which in numerous cases it can hardly be distinguished, operates beyond the domain of contracts. And although it is constantly pleaded and enforced in practice (b), it is difficult to find in the law of Scotland any precise statement of its meaning and effect except in the form and application in which it occurs here. It may not be incorrect to say that Rei interventus, i.e. the occurrence of a real change of position, is in all cases the foundation of the plea or defence known as personal bar or personal exception, which closely corresponds with the English Estoppel in pais (c).

'A personal exception may be pleaded successfully against anyone who, either by words or conduct (including culpable neglect in the transaction itself of some duty owing to the other party or the public (d)),—which words or conduct are such as to warrant a reasonable man in inferring the existence of a certain state of facts upon which he is expected to act,—has wilfully caused another to believe in the existence of that state of things, and so (e) induced him to alter his position to his prejudice. The effect of the personal exception is, that the party against whom it is pleaded is not permitted to gainsay the reasonable inference to be drawn from his words or conduct (f). The principle has been briefly explained thus, that "whatever a man's real intention may be, if he manifests an intention to another party so as to induce him to act upon it, he will be barred from denying that the intention as manifested was his real intention" (g). But, of course, where the representation is not of existing facts, but of a mere intention, i.e. a statement of something which the party intends or does not intend to do, and where he does not bind himself by a promise or contract, such a representation will not found a personal exception (h). And no one is to be prevented from asserting a just demand or averring the truth unless his conduct has caused the party pleading personal bar to alter his position (i).'

The following statement in the text of the rules common to English and Scotch law is founded on the dicta of English judges. The most explicit statement in a Scotch case is this by Lord Cranworth, C., in Cairncross v. Lorimer, 1860; 3 Macq. 827: "The doctrine will apply which is to be found, I believe, in the laws of all civilised nations, that, if a man, either by words or by conduct, has intimated that he consents to an act which has been done, and that he will offer no opposition to it, although it could not have been lawfully done without his consent, and he thereby induces others to do that from which they otherwise might have abstained,—he cannot question the legality of the act he had so sanctioned, to the prejudice of those who have so given faith to his words or to the fair inference to be drawn from his conduct." *Hunter v. For further examples of personal bar, see cases in the Digest, which are too numerous to classify or refer to. But these cases are less valuable, and, it may be feared, are sometimes ill-decided, by reason of the failure to distinguish between rei interventus and acquiescence, and indeed to state any general rules whatever. See the remark of Lord Blackburn, 8 R. H. L. 16. And see a case in which the want of a solemnity of diligence was obviated by personal exception, Taylor v. Macknight, 1882; 9 R. 857.

28. Effect of Obligations.—The essence of an obligation consists in the obligor being so bound to give, or do, or abstain, as to entitle the obligee to rely on fulfilment. The jus exigendi is the right conferred, and forms part of the universitas of the creditor's estate. The necessity of fulfilment is the obligation imposed, and forms a charge upon the debtor's funds. The effect of the obligation is to confer the right, and to impose the duty which the engagement fairly and equitably imports. Dismissing all distinction (as in the Roman law) between "contractus stricti juris" and "contractus bonæ fidei," the subject of obligations may be either general or specific; present, future, or contingent (a).

(a) 1 Stair, 10. § 2 et seq. 3 Ersk. 1. § 2, 3, and t. 3. § 83.

29. If the obligation be general, not confined to a specific thing, the engagement is absolute; provided the object of it be intelligible (a). If the object be some specific thing, the obligation is so far conditional that it may be defeated by extinction of the thing. 'That is to say, when by the nature of the contract its performance depends on the existence of a particular thing or state of things, the failure or destruction of that thing or state of things, without default on either side (b), liberates both parties. Thus if the parties contemplate as the foundation of their bargain a particular building on which work is to be done (c), or in which an entertainment is to be given (d), and it is destroyed by accidental fire; or if they contract for the sale of the corn or potatoes of a particular field and season which perish by blight (e); or of a certain quantity of grain or oil or other goods forming an undivided portion of a specific bulk, and the whole bulk is destroyed by accident (f); or if the performance of personal services which cannot be done by deputy is prevented by the promisor's death or incapacity from temporary or permanent illness (g), the contract is at an end. In such cases impossibility of performance dissolves or determines the contract, because as a matter of construction ability to do what is promised is an implied condition (h). But in general, practical impossibility of performance (such as extreme cost or difficulty) is no excuse for the non-performance of a contract (i), unless (1) the thing stipulated for is according to the existing state of knowledge so absurd, that a reasonable man would not have contemplated it (k); or (2) it is unlawful, or impossible by law (l).'

A pecuniary obligation may be enforced by execution against the estate, and, 'but now only in exceptional cases (m), against the person.

An obligation to perform an act (ad factum præstandum) has been held in England not to ground an action at law, but only a remedy in equity (n). Such contracts may in Scotland be specifically enforced where the act can be performed 'by the defender, or, failing him' by another, and the action, 'if it is not desired or is incompetent to enforce specific performance by imprisonment,' may be laid alternatively for performance or for damages (o).

Where the obligor is himself to perform the act and refuses, or where the act becomes impossible (p), damages are substituted for specific performance, 'if the obligation be in form and substance sufficiently definite to be specifically performed (q).' The imprisonment of workmen for non-performance of their engagement rests now entirely on the statutes relative to workmen (r). 'A promise to marry, or a contract of service or of partnership, will not be specifically enforced, yet damages are given for their breach. And in certain cases, one who has induced another in bad faith or negligently to act upon an informal or legally incomplete agreement, which cannot be enforced by specific implement, has been held bound to recoup specific loss or expenditure so incurred (s).'

An obligation to abstain may be enforced by interdict.

30. Damages.—An obligation may ground a claim of damages either tacitly or expressly.

31. The general rule is, that if one bound absolutely (§ 29) become, without fraud or fault (a), unable to fulfil his engagement, damages are due; the damage being indemnification for that which, by the breach of engagement, the obligee has directly lost or been prevented from gaining, with the expense of the proceedings for obtaining reparation (b). 'Whenever a breach of contract is proved, damages follow, although if no loss or inconvenience be proved the damages will be nominal (c).'

Under such claim of damage will fall lawful interest in pecuniary obligations, as the damage for money not paid (d): the loss sustained on the thing itself (propter rem ipsam non habitam); or foreseen, or naturally in the contemplation of the parties, 'as the natural result or consequence to be reasonably expected from a breach' (e): But not collateral or consequential damage (f); unless either such damage has, by special stipulation of the parties, been brought into view (g); or unless it be a loss on the thing itself, as by rise or fall of markets (h).

32. (1.) Damage in Pecuniary Obligations.—Interest.—Here interest is the damage due.

It is due by law on bills and notes from the date of the bill, in case of non-acceptance; from the day of payment of a note or of an accepted bill; from the date of presentment, if payable on demand; and from the date of acceptance—or if the acceptance is not dated, from the date of the bill—if drawn at sight (a). After denunciation, 'adjudication or decree of sale,' interest is due on the whole sum as accumulated in the diligence (b). 'It is due on all sums (including expenses of process) constituted by decree (c).' It is due on sums paid by a cautioner for the principal debtor (d). By agreement, interest 'might' be stipulated not to exceed five per cent. on a British debt, 'but since the repeal of the usury laws there is no limitation' (e). On a foreign debt, the rate 'will, in the absence of express stipulation (f),' be according to the law 'and market' of the place 'where payment is to be made' (g); but 'formerly' it 'could' not be continued beyond five per cent. after the debt 'became' British by judgment or novation (h). Interest is due as damage from delay raised by a judicial demand or protest (i); or from the rendering of accounts (k); or by duty under trust to pay money. 'Arrears of feu-duties do not bear interest, nor arrears of ground-annuals (l).' Where money has been improperly obtained, and is detained against the will of the owner, interest is due at the full legal rate, not the current rate merely (m). By implied agreement, interest is due in all cases of intromission, possession, loan, and the enjoyment of the use of money after it ought to have been paid (n), 'or where it has been overpaid or wrongly paid and a claim of repetition arises (o), "unless from the circumstances of the case there is ground in equity to hold that interest was not meant to be demanded" (p).'

Compound Interest.—As a general rule, compound interest is not due (q); but 'interest is given, by decree of the House of Lords, on the interest included in judicial accumulations (r). Accumulation of interest also is allowed on bankers' accounts periodically settled, and the interest added to the principal; on writers' accounts of cash transactions, settled annually like bankers'; on accounts of judicial factors; and on India accounts by usage; 'and where there is a fixed usage in commercial or other transactions' (s): And the law agent and cashier of tutors and curators (himself being one of them, liable for interest) has been held bound to settle yearly, and to lend out the balance or pay bank interest on it till lent out (t). 'Judicial factors, tutors at law, and similar guardians, are bound to lay out and accumulate annually the funds under their management (u).'

The question whether interest is exigible upon open accounts except from the date of citation is not authoritatively settled (unless Blair's Trs. v. Payne, 1884; 12 R. 104, following upon Cardno, cit., be thought to do so); but the preponderance of principle and practice (notwithstanding the dictum in the text) is in favour of applying the general rule that in such cases (apart from usage or stipulation) interest is due only from the date of citation, or from a year after the date of the last item (see 3 Ersk. 3. § 80). Interest is, however, in the discretion of the Court, which would probably allow it from the time when, an account being rendered with notice that interest would be claimed, it ought to have been paid. The case of Bremner v. Mabon was very special, and related besides to a law agent's accounts, consisting partly of outlays, on which interest has generally been allowed after a year from the date of rendering.

33. (2.) Damage in Obligations not Pecuniary.—To the above general rule as to damage, it is 'said by the author to be' an exception, that if the failure to fulfil the engagement be fraudulent or wilful, damage both direct and collateral is demandable; 'but while it is true that the rules for assessing damages in actions for wrongs or quasi delicts, such as slander, assault, etc., are much wider, there is little or no authority (except perhaps in actions for breach of promise of marriage) for admitting the motives or conduct of a party breaking a contract, or any circumstances not arising from the breach itself, as elements in estimating the measure of damages (a).'

In England a distinction has been made, in awarding damages for not delivering goods, between that case and the failure to restore stock lent, on the ground that, in the case of lent stock, the borrower has the lender's means in his hand; whereas in the non-delivery of goods the vendee has still his money with which to buy, and so may 'in general' indemnify himself by going to market on or about the stipulated day of delivery; and so in that case the damage is calculated according to the price at or about the day when the goods should have been delivered (b). In Scotland, the course has been, 'or rather was,' to take either the highest price which might have been got for the goods at any time after the day of sale, or the average value between the stipulated day of delivery and the date of the action (c); but the fair criterion seems to be that of the English practice—namely, the price at which the buyer could procure the goods in market at the stipulated time of delivery. 'It has been indeed repeatedly laid down in Scotland that there is no absolute rule to this effect, and that in each case the whole circumstances are to be looked at so as to give the pursuer fair compensation for his loss (d). But this proposition is not to be taken as negating the fitness of the criterion suggested for the general run of cases in which no special damage is proved. It is true that a jury, or a judge who has to deal with the facts in evidence, is not to be tied down by a hard and fast rule to give as damages for a seller's breach of contract only the difference between the contract price and the market value at the date of the breach, and is bound to consider all the facts proved. But if there be no evidence of other loss, that is the obvious and natural measure of damages in such a case.

'And it may be laid down as a rule of law and good sense in Scotland as well as in England, that the damages to be given for breach of contract are such "as may fairly and reasonably be considered either as arising naturally, i.e. according to the usual course of things, from the breach of contract itself; or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in contemplation of both parties at the time when they made the contract as the probable result of the breach of it" (e). But under the latter alternative mere knowledge of the surrounding circumstances, such e.g. as the other party's purpose in making the contract, does not impose upon the party breaking the contract liability for all the results, natural and proximate, or indirect and remote: the knowledge must be so brought home to him as to imply that he accepted the circumstances founded on as the basis of the contract, his knowledge that the person he contracts with reasonably believes that he accepts the contract with the special condition being sufficient to raise this inference (f). Thus a seller is liable for a reasonable sum for loss of profit, if he knew that the goods were for resale, and if such goods cannot be had at any price at the place of delivery (g). In short, the damages are to be what would be the natural consequences of a breach under circumstances which both parties were aware of and contemplated as the foundation of their dealing at the time of the contract (h). Accordingly damages for the loss of goods under contracts for carriage are measured by their market value (if the owner can go into the market and supply himself) at the place of delivery, independently of any circumstances peculiar to the owner, such as a contract for the sale of the goods on arrival (i). Damage is to be given as at the stipulated place of delivery (k).

(a) Mayne on Dams. p. 43 sqq. M'Dowall v. Stewart, 1871; 10 Macph. 193. When a jury or judge has to consider the amount of damages in the nature of solatium, there is of necessity a more arbitrary estimate of what is due, and the practice of judges and juries has not been subjected to strict rules. § 31 (e). The doctrine comes very near to holding that parties make the results of the breach a term of the contract. It will of course be more easy to infer that parties contemplated all the results, and accepted liability, in some kinds of contracts than others; e.g. responsibility for loss of profits upon the working of a machine will be more readily fixed on a maker who fails to have it ready by the stipulated time, than on a carrier who fails to deliver a necessary part of it. *Comp. 34. (3.) Stipulated Damages.—In relation to stipulated damages, these points are to be marked: 1. That the parties may fix the amount of loss resulting, or likely to result, from the breach of engagement, as estimated damages; in which case no inquiry into the actual damage seems competent (a), 'unless the sum assessed is exorbitant and unconscionable, when the Court will modify the penalty on equitable grounds (b)'; 2. That the obligation may be fortified by a penalty, which is held to cover but not to assess the damage, to entitle the 'Court, with, if necessary, the aid of a jury, to find under it the true amount of damage, not exceeding the penalty (c); and 3. That the stipulation of a penalty (unless when expressly so declared) is not alternative, and does not discharge the obligation on payment of the penalty (d). 'The words "liquidated damages" or "penalty" are not conclusive as to the character of the sum stipulated to be paid. This is to be gathered from the matter of agreement (e).'

35. Illegal and Immoral Contracts.—No obligation is recognised as a ground of action which is derived from an illegal or immoral contract. In such a case, "melior est conditio possidentis vel defendentis" (a). 'Illegality or Immorality in the obligation itself, as in its consideration or counterpart, makes the whole agreement void; but where the unlawful can be severed from the lawful part of a contract, and probably where the illegal part of a consideration can be apportioned, the remaining untainted portion of the contract may be enforced (b). When the obligation, though not illegal or immoral in itself, is entered into with an unlawful purpose or intention, it is void if that purpose was common to both parties, or even if it was known to both (c). If one of them was ignorant of the unlawful purpose of the other, and discovers it, he may and ought to refuse performance (d); and if the contract has already been executed, he may probably obtain restitution or repetition on equitable grounds (e). The maxim, "in pari casu potior est conditio defendentis" (also "ex turpi causa non oritur actio"), rests on the principle that "no Court will lend its aid to a man who founds his cause on an immoral or illegal act" (f); and it further follows from that principle, not only that there is no repetition of money paid or property handed over in furtherance of an unlawful contract or agreement (g), but that a completed transfer of property or of an interest in property for an unlawful consideration cannot be set aside (h). The taint of illegality extends to avoid a subsequent security for the payment of money due under an illegal contract (i). The cases both in England and Scotland hold that an insolvent purchasing by a preference a particular creditor's assent to his discharge upon a composition is not in pari delicto with the creditor extorting it, and may recover back money so paid; but if, after the arrangement is complete, the debtor voluntarily pays a bill so obtained, this is a voluntary payment of which there is no repetition (k).

36. Contracts Illegal by Statute.—No obligation to give, do, or abstain, against the express (a) prohibition of a statute, will sustain an action (b). A penalty imposed by statute is for punishment, not to give licence; and it implies prohibition (c). 'But when a duty is imposed by statute and a penalty annexed for its violation or neglect, it depends on the purview and terms of the statute whether the penalty is the sole remedy, or the administrators of the statute and persons injured have also remedies by action of damages or interdict (d).' In contracts, by force of stipulation the penalty may discharge the obligation (e).

(a) No contract can be held immoral or illegal upon a conjectural view of the construction of a statute; there must be no doubt as to its construction and effect. Barton v. Muir, 44 L. J. P. C. 19; L. R. 6 P. C. 134.

(1.) Purchase of Heritage, while it is the subject of a depending lawsuit, is forbidden to any member of the College of Justice, or any inferior Court, directly or indirectly; 'it subjects the buyer to deprivation, but' the contract is 'not' null (a). In construction this is extended to all matters in depending suits (b). But security for the costs may be taken on the subject of the lawsuit (c).

(a) The original text had it by mistake that the contract is null. See Purves and Home, infra, and 2 Ersk. Inst. 3. § 16; Pr. 2. 3. § 6.

(2.) Pactum de quota litis, or a bargain by an advocate or law agent to receive, in remuneration of his professional services, a share of the subject in contest, is unlawful at common law, and according to the spirit of the statute 1594 (a). The principle of the rule has been applied to an agreement by a country writer to employ an Edinburgh agent, and make advances of money, on condition of receiving a share of the profits (b). 'But now by statute agreements between law agents acting for the same client to share fees or profits are lawful (c).' It was even held an agreement to be discouraged in general (though in some cases allowable), for an agent to stipulate for remuneration only on success (d).

'An obligation by a client to pay to his agent a sum of money as a gift in addition to his ordinary business charges, or a gift by the client not unequivocally confirmed after the relation of agent and client has ceased, is ineffectual, and may be reduced (e). So, if a law agent or solicitor purchases or obtains a benefit from a client, the contract will, unless so confirmed, be set aside if it is connected with the business or matters to which the agent's employment extends, unless he discharges the burden of showing not only that the bargain is as good as could with due diligence have been obtained from any other purchaser, but also (apart from all questions of value and undue influence) that the client knew that he was the purchaser (f).'

(3.) Usury, forbidden by early Scottish statutes, and by an Act in Queen Anne's reign, is the taking or contracting, in the loan of money, wares, or commodities, for more than the value of £5 for the forbearance of £100 for a year; or after that rate for a greater or lesser sum, or longer or shorter time. The contract 'was' annulled if usury 'were' taken, or if it 'were' stipulated (a); but the penalties 'were' incurred only by the actual taking of the usurious interest. Where there 'was' risk in the contract beyond that of insolvency, it legalised a greater rate of interest, as in bottomry (b). The annulling of the bond or contract 'did' not annihilate the debt, if it 'could' be proved otherwise (c). By statute it 'was' provided that in the hand of an indorsee for value, a bill, though given on a usurious bargain, 'should' not be null without notice of the usury (d); and that no bill of exchange or promissory note payable within twelve months from the date, or not having more than twelve months to run, 'should' be null on usury (e). 'The laws against usury are repealed by 17 and 18 Vict. c. 90.'

(4.) Gaming, and Betting on the Game, are forbidden both in Scotland and in England, to the effect of entitling the poor of the parish in Scotland to all winnings within twenty-four hours above 100 merks; and in both countries of annulling notes and other securities for gaming debts; entitling the loser of money above £10 at a sitting, or £20 within twenty-four hours, to recover it from the winner; and giving action to common informers for the winnings and triple value, one-half to himself and the other to the poor of the parish. But, by statute, bills, notes, and mortgages in the hands of purchasers for value shall not be void, but only held as for an illegal consideration, 'i.e. "whenever such note, etc., shall be in the hands of a bonâ fide holder for value, and without notice, they shall be effectual" (a)'; and if on such instruments the granter or maker shall pay to the holder the money so secured, he shall be entitled to recover it as money paid to the original payee on an illegal consideration (b).

(5.) Sale of Offices of public trust, and those connected with the receipt of the revenue or administration of justice, or the public departments of Government at home or in the colonies, is prohibited by statutes grounded on the policy of the common law. (6.) Liquor Act.—No one may sue for the price of spirituous liquors (a) unless the debt shall have been bonâ fide contracted to the amount of twenty shillings at one time, 'or have been contracted for spirituous liquors sold to be consumed elsewhere than on the premises where sold, and delivered at the residence of the purchaser in quantities not less than a reputed quart at once (b). The statement that 'this does not apply to liquor sold for resale 'is negated by an authoritative English case (c). The true construction of the statute appears to make all sales of spirits by retail on credit illegal, so that a creditor receiving an indefinite payment to account of a claim consisting partly of items falling within the Act, cannot appropriate it to them so as to preserve entire his right of action for the remainder (d); and that a bill granted for an account part of which is for tipping is wholly vitiated (e). It seems that the Act does not apply to cases where spirits are supplied to guests lodging in the inn (f).'

37. Contracts void at Common Law.—Obligations or Contracts immoral, or contra bonos mores, are ineffectual (a). Such are: An 'obligation amounting to an' incentive or encouragement to crime, 'or a bribe to procure a pardon or stifle a prosecution' (b); but with us the sale of an expected inheritance is not so considered; though it was so in the Roman law (c): The price of prostitution 'or illicit intercourse,' from which, however, is to be distinguished a compensation for injury already sustained (d): Contracts for indecent or mischievous purposes or considerations (e), or prejudicial or offensive to the public or to third parties (f), or inconsistent with public law or arrangements (g), are invalid, and ground no action.

And wagers and sponsiones ludicre (h) 'will not be enforced, on the ground that "courts of justice were instituted to enforce the rights of parties arising from serious transactions, and can pay no regard to sponsiones ludicre" (i). But this rule does not extend so far as to prevent the Court from adjudicating on any collateral or connected matter of contract or property not involving the determination of a mere question of sport (k). A bargain for the purchase or sale of shares or goods, under which neither party has an action to compel the other to deliver or accept them, but which is in fact a mere agreement to pay the differences according to the rise or fall of the market, is not enforceable between the parties, and it is a jury question whether such a contract is a mere betting contract (l). But a broker who pays for another according to custom or by request the amount of such differences, and a turf commission agent who pays for an employer money lost on bets, have been held entitled to recover upon contracts really made for the principal (m). It is always necessary for a broker suing his principal for monies expended on such contracts or commission to prove that he has made contracts which his principal can enforce.'

38. Contracts inconsistent with Public Policy are void (a).—Of these the following are remarkable:—

(a) As to the question whether contracts contrary to public policy in the view of the Court are void, although not violating any known rule of law, see 1 Smith's L. C. 377. Farrar v. Close, L. R. 4 Q. B. 602; 38 L. J. Mag. Ca. 132; esp. per Hannen, J. Mogul Co. v. M'Gregor, Gow, & Co., 1892; A. C. 25. Nordenfellt v. Maxim-Nordenfellt Guns, etc., Co., 1894; A. C. 535, 554 (per L. Watson) (rules of policy vary with changes of times). Sir W. Erlé, Law relating to Trade Unions (1869).

39. (1.) Contracts against the Policy of the Domestic Relations.—A bond imposing a restraint on marriage (not to marry at all, or not to marry a particular person (a)) is ineffectual. And the exception contended for, where the person imposing it has an interest in the prohibition, seems not to be law; the party being left to make effectual, judicially or otherwise, any right existing independently of the forfeiture (b). When an engagement to marry is fortified by a bond in case of marrying another, the engagement may ground an action of damages for breach of promise; but no action will lie on the bond on account of marrying another (c). 'So, while a voluntary contract of separation between spouses is not now regarded as null, but is only revocable (d), it receives effect only upon the ground that immediate separation, a state of things which the law discourages, has become inevitable; and accordingly, it seems that a contract providing for future separation is invalid (e), and even that a contract of separation once avoided by reconciliation will not revive on a second de facto separation, and a stipulation to that effect is void (f).' Marriage brokerage bonds, or obligations to give a reward for influence exerted for bringing about a marriage, are void from their pernicious tendency (g).

40. (2.) Obligations in Restraint of the Liberty of the Person, if absolute and unqualified (or virtually so), are void (a). But contracts for service during a certain time (b), or obligations in restriction of the exercise of trade to particular districts, and for protection by reasonable restraint of a fair interest, are good (c): it has even been held that a restraint on trade for the lifetime of the parties is binding (d). 'It is laid down in many cases, and is the general rule, that a contract not to carry on any trade or not to carry on a particular trade, if it be unlimited in regard to time and space, or be without consideration, is invalid (e); but it is now settled that there is merely a presumption that unlimited restrictions are unreasonable and therefore invalid, which may be rebutted, all the circumstances of each case being considered; and the general principle is that covenants in restraint of trade are invalid, "unless they are natural and not unreasonable for the protection of the parties in dealing with the particular trade or business" (f).

'Contracts of association for determining the conditions of employment in any trade (i.e. rules of trade unions) are held to be illegal at common law, in the sense that they are void and incapable of being enforced by courts of law (g); and while it is now enacted by the Trade Union Act, 1871, that "the purposes of any trade union shall not, by reason merely that they are in restraint of trade, be deemed to be unlawful, so as to render" its members "liable to criminal prosecution for conspiracy or otherwise," or "so as to render void or voidable any agreement or trust" (h); yet, as it is provided that nothing in the Act shall enable any Court to enforce the ordinary rules and agreements of trade unions (i), and as such associations are unlawful at common law, it seems that no condition or stipulation, however laudable in itself, which forms one of the terms of membership of a trade union, can be directly (k) enforced in a court of law, except those expressly permitted by the Trade Union Act, 1871 (l). Where, however, it is not the general object of the society to fetter the course of trade, though certain rules have such a tendency, the latter only are invalid and the others may be enforced (m).'

42. (4.) Contracts for defeating the Revenue Laws are void, and action is denied, according to the maxim, "Potior est conditio possidentis vel defendentis" (a). This rule holds in contracts for smuggling, action being denied if the party who brings the action is aware of the design to defraud the revenue: as, for example, when he is a native of this country (b); or when, although a foreigner, he engages for or knows of the goods being packed in the way necessary to evade the revenue laws; or is participant in preparing false papers; or active in planning, forwarding, or giving aid in the scheme of evasion; or in actually landing the goods in this country (e). The same rule applies to contracts relative to contraband goods, which are known to be or purchased as contraband, being either absolutely prohibited or manifestly smuggled with the duty unpaid (d). But the rule does not hold where the goods are only sold abroad (e), or where they have been bought fairly in the market of this country (f).

43. (5.) Contracts inconsistent with the national War Policy are void (a); for war is an instrument of national justice under the direction of Government, and is not to be interfered with by individuals (b). There is no war for arms, and peace for commerce; and the hands of the enemy are not to be strengthened. Therefore the subjects or citizens of the belligerent States are enemies, and cannot lawfully trade with each other. When war intervenes, payment of debt 'and performance of contracts' due by the subjects of the one State to those of the other cannot be exacted during hostilities; but by the practice and public law of Europe the debt is not forfeited, payment being only suspended, and the debt 'or contract' reviving on the termination of hostilities (c); 'unless the nature and objects of the contract be inconsistent with suspension, when the contract is dissolved and the parties absolved from further performance (d).'

There are two exceptions to the general rule of non-intercourse during war: First, Neutrals may trade with either belligerent; and, indirectly, even between the belligerents (e). But this neutral trade is liable to these interruptions:—The right of searching private neutral merchant vessels during war to detect any breach of neutrality (f): the necessity of being furnished with neutral documents, register, passport, sea-letter, muster-roll, log-book, charter-party, invoice, and bill of lading—the want of which will strongly infer a breach of neutrality; and, much more, the destruction of papers (g): the prohibition of contraband of war—as ammunition, arms, artillery, timber for ships, naval stores, tar, pitch, hemp, sail-cloth; and also provisions going to a besieged port or country, or in circumstances indicating aid to hostilities—as to a naval and military, not a mercantile port (h): interruption by blockade, by which is meant an actual existing siege or blocking up of a city, port, or coast, known and enforced by a present and effectual force (i), although by accident or storm the blockading power may be removed for a time (k). Second, Licences by authority of Government may open, to the persons to whom they are granted, the whole or certain parts of the prohibited trade, so far as the Government which grants it is concerned; but the use of this privilege to trade with the enemy is an act of hostility (l). Licence has of late years been freely granted, and liberally construed (m).

(a) 1 Stair, 3. § 7. 3 Ersk. Pr. 1. § 3. 3 Ersk. Inst. 1. § 6, 7.

46. Future Obligations.—A debt payable on a future day certain, or an event that must arrive, is improperly termed "future." It is debitum in præsentis solvendum in futuro: "Dies cedit etsi nondum venerit." A proper debt exists from the moment of completion of the engagement; the execution only is suspended till the arrival of the appointed day (a). So claims depending on the event of a suit are not future debts, for the judgment admitting the claim draws back to the time when the debts first became due (b); e.g. the expenses of establishing a claim against a bankrupt are due (to the effect of ranking), even when his trustee refuses to sist himself in an action raised to constitute it before the sequestration' (c). But at common law, where the debtor, whose solvency is relied on in the contract, is vergens ad inopiam, or when he is diminishing a security relied on, 'but only in these or similar circumstances,' diligence for security may proceed, but not for payment (d); and so retention may be competent, but not compensation (e). By statute in the case of bankruptcy, and in contemplation of a division of funds, a creditor may claim in a sequestration, with abatement of interest to the day of payment for a debt payable at a future day (f). 'Where a term of credit is allowed for paying the price of goods, it is incompetent to raise action for the price before the term expires, unless the debtor be vergens ad inopiam' (g).

The creditor cannot be compelled to take payment before the term, especially of large sums lent out at interest (h).

The term of payment which suspends the demand in favour of the debtor, may be fixed by the original obligation, or by subsequent agreement, or by supersedere sometimes made a part of an arrangement with creditors (i). The day of payment appointed makes part of the time of suspension; so that execution cannot proceed till the following day (k). When the term is fixed by the lapse of a certain space (as to pay in ten days), the day on which the obligation is made is not included, but the term begins to run with the next day (l). Where a large sum is payable by instalments, the failure to pay one of them does not infer a power to demand the whole as a pure debt; but only to proceed to diligence in execution for what is due, and diligence in security for the rest. But it may be stipulated, that failure in one or more instalments will justify a demand for the whole; and in such a case (as when the failure of three terms is stipulated as making the whole a present debt) the debtor may avoid the penalty by requiring the creditor to receive payment of the first instalment when two are due and the third current, leaving the second unpaid (m).

As to Sundays in calculations as to steps of judicial procedure, see Macvean v. Jamieson, 1896; 23 R. Just. 25, and below, § 327 fin. In computing time under contracts the Courts are inclined to regard the intention of the parties in construing doubtful or ambiguous stipulations or conditions. (See a remarkable instance, in regard to a will, in Campbell's Trs. v. Cazenove, 1880; 8 R. 21.) It is, however, a general rule that time is calculated not de momento in momentum (naturalis computatio), but de die in diem (civilis computatio), i.e. that fractions of days are not to be reckoned, but computation is to the midnight following or preceding the last day of the specified term. Comp. L. Pres. Campbell, 3 Pat. 437, with Savigny, § 182; and see Pugh v. D. of Leeds, 2 Cowp. 714, 720. Lester v. Garland, 12 M. & W. 2. In re Railway Sleepers Co., 29 Ch. D. 203. Commentators on the Roman law have gathered from the instances which occur in the law sources the further rule, that when, as in usucapion, a right is acquired by the lapse of a period of time, the preceding midnight is to be taken as its termination (dies inceptus pro completo habetur), because the person acquiring is entitled at any moment of the calendar day to regard the acquisition as completed; but that if, as in the prescription of actions, a right is lost by the lapse of the period, the following midnight is the end of the term, because the person who has the right of action may assert, by reason of the uncertainty inherent in the limitation put upon his right, that he can still bring his action at any moment of the last day. This holds, it is said, in ordinary cases where the lapse of a period of time is made the condition of a change in the rights of a party; but if the condition expressly requires the period of time to be completed and overpassed, then even in regard to the acquisition of a right, the following midnight is the limit, because, as the calendar day is indivisible, it can only be said on the next day that the period has been exceeded. Savigny, Syst. iv. 352–53. This distinction is not expressly recognised in our law; but the principle receives effect in computing the induciae of summonses and terms appointed by law or by Courts for complying with judicial orders, in which the term runs till the midnight following the last day. The rule that fractions of a day are disregarded has no place in diligence and competitions of rights depending on it, where all depends on the arithmetical reckoning of time (naturalis computatio). See Digests, voce Arrestment, and e.g. Wilson, etc., Prs., 1891; 19 R. 219. And a fraction of a day is also considered when the good sense of the matter or the intention of parties requires it. 47. Contingent and Conditional Obligations.

—An obligation, of which the efficacy depends on an event which must certainly happen, is properly a future debt; but one which depends on an uncertain future event is properly contingent. The contingency operates either in suspending the debt or in dissolving it. In either case, the engagement or obligation is independent of the event; the existence or discharge of the debt rests on it entirely. Under a suspensive condition, there is no debt till the event exists (dies nec credit nec venit), and yet the engagement cannot be defeated otherwise than by failure of the condition. When the condition is fulfilled, the debt becomes perfect. If the condition be resolutive, the debt at once ceases on the event stipulated (a). Conditions must be lawful in order to receive effect. What conditions are so to be regarded will be discussed hereafter (b). They may be not only express, but implied. Thus, an obligation to pay a tocher implies marriage as a condition (c).

(a) It may be doubted whether future and contingent estates coming to a bankrupt can be regarded as funds of his, which his creditors can attach by diligence of adjudication or arrestment in security. Aitkenhead v. Bothwell, 1630; M. 9491; 1 Ill. 59, 93. Ragg v. Brown, 1708; M. 9492. Beaton, Jan. 7, 1821; F. C. This case is not reported. See 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, § 103, 53, 54, as to claiming for contingent debts in sequestrations.

48. As a creditor in a future debt may insist for additional security should the credit fail on which he had relied, so a contingent creditor may, for the protection of his right, follow a similar course (a). In the case of a suspensive condition, the creditor is in bankruptcy not admitted to draw a dividend, but only to have one set aside to abide the event. Under a resolutive condition, the obligee is creditor de presenti, and entitled to claim for the computed value (b).

(b) 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, § 53.

49. (1.) Possible or Impossible Conditions.—

The latter (including unlawful conditions) annul the obligation to which they are annexed, as not being seriously intended, nor relied on (a). 'A condition makes the existence of an obligation depend on a future contingent event; but if the obligation be dependent on an event which is either necessary or impossible, there is obviously no contingency. In the former case there is no condition, and the contract is pure; in the latter, what is, ex figura verborum, an obligation, is in substance none, being negated by the condition (b).' But an important distinction is to be marked in deeds of settlement, and in obligations and provisions to which the granter is naturally bound (c).

(c) Of these notice will be taken hereafter, § 1785 and 1883.

50. (2.) Potestative, Casual, or Mixed Conditions.—Potestative depend on an act which is in the power of one or other of the parties (a): Casual depend on mere accident, or the will of a third party: Mixed partake of both.

If time be annexed to the condition (as the arrival or non-arrival of a ship (b)), the expiration of the time, the happening of the event, or the impossibility of it, terminate the contingency, and, as lawyers term it, purify the condition (c). If there be no time annexed, the contract is pendent while the condition is possible. The condition may be precedent or subsequent; which nearly corresponds with the condition suspensive or resolutive. In the former, as in a conditional bond, dies nec cedit nec venit till the event; in the latter, as in an annuity bond, the obligation ceases on the event.

If the debtor, bound under a certain condition, have impeded or prevented the event, it is held as accomplished. If 'in such circumstances' the creditor have done all that he can to fulfil a condition which is incumbent on himself, it is held sufficient implement (d). 'So also if the person in whose favour the condition is conceived has waived or renounced its fulfilment (e).'

Bury Comrs. § 29 (i), and Pollock on Contr. 410 sq., and Addison on Contr. 131, 811, 840. In Paterson v. M'Ewan's Trs., 1881, 8 R. 646, which properly, however, was a question as to an alleged implied obligation, the opinions show that one does not impede or prevent a condition from being fulfilled in the sense of this rule, who merely exercises a separate and independent right, provided (it would seem) that that right has not been subsequently acquired with the wrongful purpose of defeating the condition or preventing the performance of the contract; and (it may be added) provided that the existence of the right has not been unfairly concealed from the other party. The principle in the text also applies where the performance of a contract becomes impossible by the act or wilful default of one of the parties. That is a breach of contract entitling the other to damages or to enforce his rights under the contract, as the case may be. Cases cited above and in (e); and cf. Kinninmont v. Paxton, 1892; 20 R. 128. See below, § 910A.

51. Joint and Several Obligations.—Obligations may be viewed as joint or several, either as in relation to the creditors or to the debtors. The general rule and presumption is, that each co-obligant is concerned to the extent of his own share only, not for the whole. And this applies equally to creditors and to debtors (a).

52. (1.) Co-Creditors.—When a bond or bill is granted to two or more persons, or when two or more succeed to a debt (as, for example, heirs-portioners), their right is pro rata, each for a share. The entire debt cannot be sued for, or assigned, or fully discharged, but by them all; though each co-creditor may assign his individual share, or sue for it separately, or grant an effectual discharge for it (a). But a right may be established in solidum in each, by convention, as where the obligation is taken to them jointly and severally, in which case a mandate is held as given to each co-creditor; or by partnership express or tacit (b). Under such a right each may sue or discharge the debt; and judicial proceedings taken by one will, in a question of prescription, be available to all.

53. (2.) Co-Debtors.—The general rule and presumption holds with regard to debtors, whether bound simply in a bond or bill (a), or becoming liable as heirs-portioners (b). The rule is confirmed when the obligant is taken bound for his own share only, as in a policy of insurance.

(a) This seems to be a mistake. See § 61.

54. Exceptions are admitted to the rule either on express or on implied agreement.

If the obligation bear the money to be "for the use of one," or if the obligants are bound for a town or corporation (a), all are held as cautioners, and liable each for the whole (b).

(a) Quere? See Menzies' Lect. 203. 2 Jur. Styles, 314. The case cited (Inverness) was decided on the simple ground that the obligants were cautioners.

Wilson*, 1890; 17 R. 608; but the opinions of the minority in this case show that the rule of procedure is contrary to principle, if not to authority. It ought not to be applied where the debt is less than £25, and so cannot be sued for in the Court of Session. Comp. § 550.

57. If they are bound "conjunctly," each is liable for the whole, though at first this point was doubted (a); and they are held to be so liable, if such be the fair import of the obligation taken in all its parts (b). But any one called on to pay, is 'in general (c)' entitled to have the others also called before he is forced to pay.

It rather seems that the word "conjunctly" does not import a liability in solidum. See Campbell, cit. 1 Stair, 17. § 20. M'Kellar v. Campbell, June 7, 1811; F. C.; except in the event pointed out by Parke, B., in King v. Hoare, 13 M. & W. 505; i.e. where a party sued severally does not plead in abatement. See below, § 62. 58. If the subject of the obligation be indivisible, or the obligation ad factum præstandum, each is bound for the whole, though the words "jointly" etc., be not used (a). But the liability is only pro rata, according to the general rule and natural construction, where the obligation is alternative (one divisible, the other not), and the indivisible alternative becomes imprestable. The obligation for the divisible alternative binds the debtors pro rata. The mere resolving into a claim of damages does not alter the obligation in solidum to an obligation pro rata (b).

The true distinction is rather this: indivisible obligations involving liability in solidum are only those in which the stipulation or promise itself is directed to the doing or giving of something indivisible; but when such prestations are not in obligatione, but in conditione, as when a pecuniary penalty is stipulated in the event of failure in an act or omission promised, the obligation becomes one for payment of money, and such obligations are always divisible. Savigny, Obligationenrecht, § 31, 34, vol. i. p. 326, 367.

59. Partners in trade (a), or joint adventures (b), or joint purchasers (c), or even joint pursuers in an action in which expenses are found due to the defender, 'or joint delinquents (d)', are each in solidum bound for the whole (e).

60. Parties jointly interested in any employment, the prosecution or accomplishment of which they have authorised, are held each in solidum bound for the whole debt incurred by such employment (a). But this may be counteracted by an express stipulation to the contrary (b). The rule formerly applied in sequestration is altered, and the claim of an agent restricted to the amount of the funds, 'and the personal liability of the trustee employing him (c),' or the express engagement of individual creditors (d).

62. (3.) Relief inter se.—But co-obligants, even when bound in solidum to the creditor, are, in relation to each other, liable only pro rata in relief or indemnification to those of their number who shall have paid more than their share (a).

The right to relief is regulated by these rules:—If bound "each for his share," although no one can be called upon by the creditor to pay more, yet if he should pay more, he becomes the creditor of the co-obligants whose shares are thus paid. A co-obligant bound "jointly" may refuse to pay till each co-obligant shall be called: If bound "jointly and severally," any one may be selected by the creditor for payment of the whole. In either of these cases, the person who shall pay the portion of another will be entitled to relief to that extent, without an assignation (b). The insolvency of a joint obligant lays on the rest pro rata the burden of his share. If the obligation be "indivisible," or expressly "several," there is no relief but against the principal debtor. A co-obligant making payment of the debt, is bound, in claiming relief, to communicate the benefit of any deduction or "ease" (as it is sometimes called) which he may receive at settling, or which may accrue from the funds of insolvent co-obligants (c). 'There is no right of relief in respect of payment of a debt which the alleged debtor was only under a moral obligation to pay (d); or of one which the pursuer claiming relief was under no legal obligation to pay, and did not pay as agent of the defender, such as damages for injury sued for but paid by way of compromise before judgment (e).'

63. Unilateral Obligations may be either gratuitous or for valuable consideration. It is not necessary that an obligation shall proceed upon a valuable consideration, adequate or inadequate. It is effectual if an engagement (§ 7) be proved by such evidence as law requires in the special case (§ 15, etc.). But still there is a distinction of importance, in some respects, between obligations with or without consideration.

64. (1.) Gratuitous.—Obligations which are, as free gifts, voluntarily undertaken, or at least without an adequate consideration, are called gratuitous, and are effectual. Donations once made, otherwise than by last Will, 'or mortis causa (a),' are not revocable (b), except between husband and wife (c). 'Donation may be proved by parole (d); but there is a strong presumption against it, which can be overcome only by strong and unimpeachable evidence (e).'

But although gratuitous obligations are effectual against the obligor and his heirs, they are by statute liable to be declared void at the suit of a prior creditor, if the grantor is already insolvent, and the grantee is a near relation or confidant (f).

In England, obligations without consideration are nuda pacta (g), 'and although it had been thought that' a moral cause is a good consideration, 'that view has been negatived, and it has been settled that a mere moral obligation is not a sufficient foundation for a binding promise (h). As the practical use of the English doctrine of consideration is to provide evidence and guard against inconsiderate and improvident engagements, it has come to be a rule that, in the absence of fraud, there can be no inquiry as to the adequacy of the consideration (i); yet in questions as to the validity of contracts, the insufficiency of the consideration or counterpart is important though not conclusive evidence of error or fraud (k). Accordingly, if the consideration be inadequate, 'and' the obligation fraudulent, it will not be admitted into competition with creditors who have given value for the debt on which they make their demand (l); and the existence of debt at the time of granting is of importance, as grounding a presumption of fraud (m).

65. Of gratuitous obligations, alimentary provisions are among the most frequent. They are, in relation to the debtor and his creditors, under the same rules as other obligations. But the nature of the right conferred on the creditor is very different, and especially considered as a fund attachable for his debts (a).

(a) See 1 Bell's Com. 128; below, § 2276.

66. (2.) Onerous obligations are such as are granted for a valuable consideration (a); to which, however, by the law of Scotland, something more is necessary than a mere obligation in morality (b). Every obligation is presumed to be for an adequate consideration.

(a) The word Onerous, in contradistinction to Gratuitous, is used in the law of Scotland as synonymous with the English phrase, "for a valuable consideration."

(b) See Henderson v. Paul, § 62 (d).

67. Money obligations are required to be in writing; the essential and indispensable part of which is the personal engagement to pay. And this may either be by formal bond, or by simple engagement to pay the sum, as in a promissory-note.

68. (3.) Enforcement.—A formal bond has, added to the obligation or engagement, a consent to the registration of the bond in the books of a competent court, and to a summary warrant for execution being issued, as if decree were pronounced on the bond. On such registration, at any time of the year (Session or Vacation), execution may proceed (a). A similar expedient for saving the delay and expense of an action was, without the necessity of any express consent, adopted by statute in the case of promissory-notes and bills of exchange (b). 'All bonds taken to Her Majesty, though not having a clause of registration, may be registered for execution (c).'

In every bond there must be an obligor, an obligee, and a sum engaged to be paid, or act to be performed.

It is important to observe the distinction between a bond as the groundwork of summary execution, and as the groundwork of an action. The difference of effect practically is, that summary execution, besides avoiding delay and expense, cannot be questioned or suspended without finding caution; while there is no such necessity in defending against an action. For summary execution, the obligation must be so certain and precise, that it may at once be enforced without further inquiry. But this, in bank bonds for cash accounts, or suretyship for bank agents, is sufficiently complied with, if the sum for which execution is to proceed is fixed by reference to an account from the bank books, to be signed by the accountant or some other officer of the bank (d). A bond not in itself clear and conclusive, but indefinite, or requiring something to be ascertained judicially before it can be put to execution, must be followed by an action, in order to obtain a warrant for diligence (e). But though defective in the expression of the obligatory clause, if from other parts of the instrument the obligation is clear, the bond will be effectual (f).

M. Bell's Lect. 219 sqq. Duff, Mov. Deeds, § 15. 31 and 32 Vict. c. 101, § 138 (short statutory clause of consent to registration). By 1693, c. 15, and 1696, c. 39, registration is competent even after the death of the creditor, or of the debtor, in a bond containing such clause of consent. See 1 and 2 Vict. c. 114, § 1, etc. (Personal Diligence Act).

69. Execution of the obligation is to be enforced according to its terms and extent, express or implied; and so execution may at once proceed for a pure debt. If payable at a future term, no proceedings can be taken upon it, unless the debtor be vergens ad inopiam; in which case diligence for security, 'or retention,' is permitted. If the debt be contingent, proceedings to the same effect may be taken where the debtor is vergens ad inopiam (a).

(a) See above, § 45-8. 3 Ersk. 6. § 18. 2 Ersk. 12. § 4. Linton v. Sutherland, 1889; 17 R. 213.

70. Mutual Obligations or Contracts.—A mutual contract is the reciprocal undertaking or engagement of two or more persons, whereby something is to be given, or done, or abstained from, on the one side, for a valuable consideration or counter-engagement on the other: "Duorum pluriumve in idem placitum consensus et conventio"; each being bound, and each acquiring a right, by the convention.

71. Those engagements are either strictly reciprocal, or with a difference in time or place. Hence arise these important consequences,—that both are bound, or neither (a); that where the obligations are strictly reciprocal, if one refuse, or delay performance 'of a material part of the contract (b),' the other whose part is still unfulfilled is entitled to refuse 'performance' or retain (c); that where the obligations are not strictly reciprocal in point of time, the anterior obligation may be suspended, if the party whose performance is postponed be vergens ad inopiam, 'or at all events if he be openly insolvent' (d); and that, if the one party cannot fulfil his part, the other may be free, or may insist for damages (e). 'As a pursuer in an action upon a mutual contract must show that he has performed or offered to perform his part of the contract, it is open to the defender to plead and prove that he has not done so, not merely to the effect of relieving himself from the fulfilment of the counterpart so far as unperformed, but of retaining or appropriating monies due under the contract in payment of damages arising from the other party's breach. And, as this rests upon the general law of contracts, and not upon the statute as to compensation (see below, § 572 sqq.), it is not required that the damages shall be liquidated or ascertained, or that they shall be sued for in a separate action; but the claim may be pleaded in defence (f).'

72. Offer and Acceptance.—A mutual contract may commence by offer, and be completed by acceptance (a).

73. (1.) Offer.—An offer is an obligation provisional on acceptance. It is presumed to be continued till acceptance (a); but 'a simple offer' may, before acceptance, be recalled. 'In England an offer, being without consideration, may be revoked at any time before acceptance, even if the offerer has promised to keep it open for a certain time (b); but by the law of Scotland it is a question of intention or construction in each case whether an offer does or does not amount to a promise (§ 8, 9, supra) binding the offerer for a reasonable time, or until a specified time. If it does not, there is locus poenitentiae (§ 25); if it does, the offeree duly accepting it may claim performance of the completed contract, or damages for its breach (c); but if there be no such promise, no obligation exists, and it is not correct to say that the withdrawal takes effect only' under the burden of making reparation for any loss fairly occasioned by the offer (d). 'But the recall of an offer has no effect unless it be communicated to the other party before acceptance (e).'

74. An offer may be made by parole; by letter; or even tacitly, as when goods are sent without an order or contrary to order, in which cases acquiescence is acceptance (a). 'It may be made by advertisement or circular addressed to the public or to a class of persons; and then, in the absence of wilful misrepresentation, it is a question of interpretation whether it is (1) an offer which becomes a contract with any one who, before it is retracted, fulfils the conditions mentioned in it; as in offers of reward for the detection of criminals (b), some unqualified statements in railway time-tables (c), the advertisement of a general ship (d), and perhaps in advertisements of sales "without reserve" (e); or (2) merely a declaration that the advertiser will do a certain kind of business, or enter into a particular dealing, and an invitation to the world to make offers; as, e.g., in a simple advertisement of a sale by auction or by tender, which does not imply any contract that all the goods mentioned shall be actually exposed (f), or that the highest tender shall be accepted (g).'

75. (2.) Acceptance.—Acceptance is either Tacit or Express.

76. Tacit acceptance may be inferred from silence, where the proposal is so put as to require rejection if the party do not mean to assent (a); as when a merchant writes to another that he is against a certain day to send him a certain commodity at a certain price, unless he shall previously forbid (b). An offer may be tacitly accepted by immediate compliance in sending the goods, for then the execution is the acceptance; or by proceeding on the offer to transact with third parties when a mandate to that effect is implied in the offer (c); or by a demand or action for implement before the offer is withdrawn (d).

78. The acceptance completes the contract 'if it be despatched before receipt of a retraction of the offer (a) within any time that may be stated in the offer as a limit, or if there be no such limited time, while no such change of circumstances has taken place as makes the tender unsuitable and absurd (b).' The agreement is not suspended till the offerer has received notice of the acceptance (c), though contended for by some commentators (d); but this is under the qualification that there shall be no undue delay in notifying the acceptance. 'It is settled that the contract is completed by despatch of the acceptance by the usual or intended method of transmission (generally the post-office) (e), even if it should never reach the offerer (f); but it seems also that the acceptance may be annulled by revocation, e.g. by telegram which reaches the offerer before or simultaneously with it (g).'

James, cit.)*, viz. that "a contract by correspondence is in some sort ad longum manum," i.e. that "the sender of the first letter is to be regarded as if he had gone to meet the other, and had received his assent," at the destination of his letter. Revocation is exceptional, and "when it does happen the question can only be decided by taking into account a multitude of particular circumstances, so that the arbitrary rule proposed by our opponents is not sufficient."—Savigny, l.c.

79. The provisional engagement of an offer may become ineffectual by the death of the offerer, or by his bankruptcy before acceptance; there being no final consent or contract on the part of the offerer till acceptance (a). It is 'not' held to be withdrawn by an alteration of circumstances before acceptance (b) 'unless the continuance of a particular state of circumstances is a condition of the offer expressed or implied.' If a time be limited for acceptance, the offer is held to subsist, and not to be revocable during that time (c); and to be withdrawn by the expiration of that time without acceptance; and the return of post is, in mercantile cases, presumed to be the time limited (d). If, under such limitation of time, the delay in the acceptance beyond the time allowed have been occasioned by the offerer himself (as by a wrong address of the offer), the mere expiration of the time mentioned in the original offer, or implied in it, will not discharge the offer (e). If the offer be accompanied by a recall sent by the same post, it is not binding (f).

80. Order in Trade.—An order must be distinguished from an offer. It is a part of the law of mandate; and acceptance is presumed from the undertaking which one in trade is held to profess, that he will answer any orders in the line of his trade, or immediately intimate his refusal; and more especially when the dealer has circulated current price lists of goods to be sold by him.

81. An order in trade must be absolute, and neither uncertain, conditional, nor alternative, otherwise it becomes a mere offer. An order may be rejected, but does not require acceptance to bind the person who gives the order. It will bind also the person to whom it is addressed, if strictly in his line of trade, unless refused in course of post,—as an order for goods to a dealer; for insurance to an insurance broker; for carriage of goods to a public carrier (a).

82. An order may, by the law of Scotland, be in writing or parole (a). It is otherwise in England, by the Statute of Frauds; and this must be attended to in making use of English cases and authorities on this point (b). 'When an order is sent by telegram, the sender is not responsible for a mistake made by the telegraph clerk in transmitting it; and there is no contract unless the message be correctly delivered (c).'

An order must be executed in the terms in which it is given, and is not otherwise binding on the person who gives it (d); but acquiescence in the mode of execution followed may make an effectual agreement (e).

'Particular Contracts.—In the fourth edition (1839) the author thus introduces the subject of Particular Contracts:—

The main objects of contracts are—1. The transferring and disposing of property, by sale, or location, or loan, or deposit, or pledge; 2. The employment of manufacturers and workmen whose labours are used in the common intercourse of life, or the engaging of professional aid in law, medicine, etc.; 3. The carrying trade of the country by land and sea; 4. The administering of affairs during absence, by means of factors or mandatories; 5. The insuring of property against perils by sea, fire, etc.; 6. The combination in partnership of the capital, skill, and industry of several in one common concern; or finally, the circulating of money and credit by means of notes and bills negotiable. . In considering these several contracts and forms of engagement, they may be reduced to these four classes: First, The Contract of Sale, by which goods and commodities are transferred.

Secondly, Those Contracts in the course and existence of which the property of one is necessarily entrusted to the care or custody of another. Thirdly, Those in which personal credit is more immediately the object of convention; and, Fourthly, Those by which maritime concerns are carried on or made safe.

85. Nature of the Contract of Sale (a).—The contract of sale is a mutual consensual contract, for the transference of property, in consideration of a price; the seller binding himself to deliver and transfer the thing; the buyer to pay the price.

(a) 1 Stair, 14. 3 Ersk. by Ivory, 3, § 2-13. 3 Ersk. Pr. 3, § 2-4. 1 Bell's Com. 166 sqq., 434 sqq. M. P. Brown on Sale. 2 Kent, Com. 468. Pothier, Tr. du Cont. de Vente. 1 Domat, tit. 79. Code Civ. § 1582-83. 4 Van Leeuwin, c. 17. See also the Author's Inquiries into the Law of Sale of Goods and Merchandise, Edin. 1844. Blackburn, Contr. of Sale. Benjamin, Sales of Pers. Prop.

86. (1.) Sale, as a contract, is distinguished from sale as a transference. The contract of sale, when completed, is, in the law of Scotland, nothing more than the titulus transferendi domini, with obligations on either part to pay the price and to deliver the thing sold (a). No property passes till delivery; nothing but the jus ad rem specificam (b).

'(2.) Sale of Goods Act, 1893.—This codifying and assimilating statute has materially, in regard to goods, altered the principles of law stated in the foregoing paragraph, and more fully treated of below in § 1299 sqq. By the new law, "a contract of sale of goods (i.e. all corporeal moveables except money) is a contract whereby the seller transfers or agrees to transfer the property in goods to the buyer for a money consideration called the price" (c).

'When under a contract of sale the property in the goods is transferred from the seller to the buyer (which in the case of specific or ascertained goods depends on the intention of the parties (d)), the contract is called a sale; but when the transfer of the property is to take place at a future time or subject to a condition thereafter to be fulfilled, the contract is called an agreement to sell. An agreement to sell becomes a sale when the time elapses or the conditions are fulfilled subject to which the property is to be transferred (e).

'Thus an agreement to sell (or executory contract of sale) is a contract pure and simple; a sale is a contract plus a conveyance, and the distinction involves important differences in regard to the remedies available to buyer and seller respectively in case of breach, as well as in regard to risk (f).

'In this matter property means "general" or absolute property, not special property such as that of a bailee or custodier (g), and in that respect Prof. Bell's note to this section is erroneous (h).'

(a) A distinction is to be observed between the language of the English law and that of the Scottish in this respect; for much confusion has arisen from this source, in running the analogy between the laws of the two countries (Brown on Sale; Introductory discourse). The English lawyers say that, the contract of sale being completed, the property is passed (2 Blackst. 448). They do not, however, mean by this that the absolute property, the proprietary right or dominium, is thenceforward with the buyer; but only that a special property, jus ad rem specificam, has passed. There is still with the seller a right to retain the thing sold for the price. The English law in this respect is law in America (2 Kent, Com. 498); and by the Code Civil of France, the rule which formerly prevailed there, according to the principle of the civil law, has been abandoned, and the property held to pass with the completion of the contract (Cod. Civ. No. 938; 1583. 6 Toullier, 213). In Holland the property is not passed till delivery on credit, or payment of the price (4 Van Leeuwin, c. 17, § 3. 4 Dig. lib. 18. t. 1. c. 19. Voet. lib. 6. t. 1: De rei vind. § 20).

(b) This chapter treats of Sale as a personal contract, or jus ad rem. Separately it is considered as constituting a real right, or jus in re. See § 1299 et seq.

(d) Ib. § 17 (1).

(e) Ib. § 1 (3), (4).

(f) Chalmers, Sale of Goods Act, p. 6.

(g) 56 and 57 Vict. c. 71, § 62 (1).

(h) The law of England is more correctly stated in Bell on Sale, p. 15. R. Brown, Sale of G. Act, p. 5.

87. Risk.—(1.) The risk of the thing sold is, 'by the common law of Scotland,' on the buyer, according to the maxim, "Periculum rei venditæ nondum traditæ est emptoris" (a); and this 'was' strengthened if the goods 'were' deposited, or placed (as on shipboard) at the buyer's desire (b). 'Professor Bell went on to say,' This, in the law of Scotland, does not, as in England, proceed on the ground that the property is transferred; but the engagement of the seller being to deliver the thing sold, and the right of the buyer being ad rem specificam, the engagement is discharged, and the right extinguished by the thing perishing without fault. On the other hand, the engagement of the buyer is to pay the price; against which it is no answer that the thing has not been delivered, if it have perished without fault of the seller (c). In order to transfer the risk to the buyer, the thing must be specifically appropriated as under the contract, i.e. the thing sold must be ascertained and identified so that the buyer is creditor for delivery of a specific thing (d).

(2.) General Rule.—The law is now assimilated to that of England, which rests on the general rule "res perit domino," to which in the civil law and our own the maxim "periculum rei venditæ," etc., was an exception. The alteration in the law of risk, however, is probably not great, as we in Scotland formerly reached the same result by a different road. The general rule as to risk of ascertained and identified goods is contained in the Sale of Goods Act, viz.: Unless otherwise agreed, the goods remain at the seller's risk, until the property therein is transferred to the buyer, but when the property is transferred to the buyer, the goods are at the buyer's risk, whether delivery has been made or not (e).

'Variations on this general rule, as on other rules in the statute, may be freely made by the agreement of parties expressed or implied (f). And it applies of course only to sales, not to agreements to sell, i.e. not to contracts for the sale of unascertained goods (g).

'(3.) It is further provided that "where delivery has been delayed through the fault of either buyer or seller, the goods are at the risk of the party in fault, as regards any loss which might not have occurred but for that fault"; and that "nothing in this section (Act, § 20) shall affect the duties or liabilities of either seller or buyer as a bailee or custodian of the goods of the other party" (h).

'(4.) Where, on the other hand, the agreement is to deliver any goods of a certain description,—venditio generis (as opposed to venditio speciei or v. corporis), similar to the executory contract for a sale of goods in the law of England (i), or the "agreement to sell" of the Sale of Goods Act,—the buyer has no right to demand delivery of a specific thing, and the seller fulfils his obligation by delivering any goods answering to the description. The seller's obligation cannot therefore be discharged by any damnum fatale affecting any goods which he may hold, for the risk, in the sense in which the word is here used, can only attach to an ascertained subject. Genus nunquam perit (k).'

(i) Benjamin on Sales, 5, 273, 318.

(k) Pothier, Vente, No. 179. It would seem, though it was not expressly decided, that, in the common law of Scotland, on a sale of a definite and ascertained mass or bulk at a price depending on weight or measurement, the risk did not pass to the buyer until the price was ascertained. Per L. J.-C. Inglis in Hansen v. Craig & Rose, cit. See below, § 88 (e). There is little doubt that our Courts would practically have reached the same result as those of England (see Busk v. Davis, 2 M. & S. 397; Campbell v. Mersey Docks Co., 14 C. B. N. S. 412, and others in Benjamin on Sales, 311 sqq.), which is now our law also under the Act, § 18' (2), (3), in regard to the sale of an undivided and unascertained portion of a specific mass or bulk (e.g. oil in tanks, or corn in a store, or sheep by number out of a flock), viz. that the buyer has no jus ad rem (in England no property), and therefore no risk, till his portion is measured, weighed, or counted and separated (see Hansen v. Craig, cit., and Anderson & Crompton v. Walls & Co., cit.—per L. Cowan). The argument in the learned notes in the last edition of 1 Bell's Com. 461 sq., 473, fails to notice that in such a sale the buyer whose portion has not been separated cannot have a jus ad rem specificam in any usual and proper sense of the words. Hence, where it is a term of the contract that the subject sold is to be furnished out of a particular mass, which totally perishes by accident, the performance of the contract becomes impossible, and neither party is bound. See § 29, supra.

88. But the risk is continued on the seller, where there is undue delay in making delivery without fault on the buyer's part (a); 'where the vendor neglects to give timeous notice of shipment so as to enable the buyer to insure (b), or fails to put the goods in such a course of conveyance as to give the buyer indemnity against the carriers in case of loss (c)'; where there is an express or implied undertaking of the risk by the seller, as to deliver at a certain place (d); or where anything remains to be done in completing, ascertaining, or identifying the thing to be delivered (e), 'or fixing its price (f)'. The matter may be stated thus: under the former law the risk passed to the buyer when he acquired by the contract a jus ad rem, or special right to have delivery, as against the seller (g), of a specific thing, and it now passes to him with the transference of the property, unless it is continued with the seller either (1) by mora or other fault on his part (notes (a), (b), (c)); or (2) by the intention of the parties expressed in the bargain, or implied in its terms (h).'

89. Completion and Evidence.—(1.) The contract of sale is complete when the parties are agreed, the one to pay a certain price, and the other to sell for that price a certain subject. There is then consensus in idem placitum et conventio (a). Written evidence of the consent is required in Scotland to complete the contract of sale of land, of copyright, of ships, and of goods bonded for duties in the warehouse of the importer (b). But the sale of goods and merchandise in general is effectually proved by evidence prout de jure; parole, written, or confession (c). When the bargain is made by the principals without writing, the evidence of two witnesses, or one corroborated by circumstances, is necessary; or the letters of the parties, holograph, or signed by them, are good proof (d). 'The Sale of Goods Act provides as follows: Subject to the provisions of this Act, and of any statute in that behalf (e), a contract of sale may be made in writing (either with or without seal), or by word of mouth, or partly in writing and partly by word of mouth, or may be implied from the conduct of the parties (f).' Where a factor or broker makes the bargain, his authority must be proved. Where, as in England, and in great mercantile cities, brokers are employed, a bought and sold note, signed by him, completes the bargain (g): Or, where he acts for both, the entry of the sale in his book, accompanied by the notes sent to the parties, completes the contract in England (h); though there is not in Scotland any necessity, as by the practice of England (i), for a signed note to be entered in the broker's book (k). If, in a sale by intervention of a broker, the buyer's name be not previously communicated by the broker, there is a power of rejection within a reasonable time, on disclosure of the name (l).

(d) See below, § 2232. The proof of this contract in England is regulated by the Statute of Frauds (29 Ch. II. c. 3, § 17), and a supplementary Act (9 Geo. IV. c. 14): the former requiring in sales for £10 or upwards, either a note in writing, signed by the parties; or something given in earnest to bind the bargain; or part payment of the price; or delivery and acceptance of part of the goods sold; the latter supplying a defect in the older statute, by providing that the same rule shall apply to executory sales; i.e. where the goods are to be delivered at some future period, or are not yet made, or provided, or ready for delivery. 90. Essentials of Sale.—It is essential in 'a contract of' sale that there shall be a determinate subject and a price; but it is not necessary that the subject should be identified, or the price a certain definite sum; 'but till the subject is identified there can be only an agreement to sell, not a sale (a).'

In relation to the subject, sale may be of three several kinds:—1. Of a certain specific thing, clearly distinguished in description, or set apart for the buyer; or 2. Of a determinate quantity, or number, or weight, of a commodity, described generically,—as cattle, or corn, or wine; or 3. Of a commodity or thing to be prepared or provided for delivery at some future time, 'now called in the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, "future goods," whether they are to be manufactured or merely acquired by the seller (b).',—as a ship to be built; or provisions to be furnished for a voyage, or an hospital, or an army. This last is in England called an "executory sale," though, properly speaking, there are combined with the contract of sale other contracts,—as locatio operis, mandate, etc. (c). 'The second also is in England an executory agreement, but capable of being converted into an actual sale (bargain and sale) by specific appropriation of goods to the contract (d).

'If the specific goods sold or agreed to be sold have perished without the knowledge of the seller at the time when the contract is made, the contract is void (e). This may be referred in principle, either to mutual error (§ 11 (d)), or impossibility of performance (§ 29).'

(a) i.e. The identification of the subject is not necessary to the completion of the contract, though it is necessary to the passing of property and the risk. See above, § 86, 88. 1 Bell's Com. 437; infra, § 91 (2), and § 92 (c).

91. Subject or Thing Sold.—(1.) In proper sale, a certain specific commodity capable of identification is sold; and as soon as it is so, it lies for delivery to the buyer at his risk. The property is passed in England; in Scotland, 'formerly only' the jus ad rem specificam; 'but since Jan. 1, 1894, the property also passes at the making of the contract, or at such time as the parties intend it to pass (a).' In a sale of a certain number, or quantity, or weight of a commodity, described generically, until the stipulated quantity is separated from the mass, or weighed or measured off, neither the property in England nor the specific right in Scotland 'was' passed, nor 'is' the risk laid on the buyer; and yet the contract is 'and was' obligatory, and will ground an action for fulfilment 'as an agreement to sell' (b). In the executory sale also, 'of a thing to be made or provided by the seller,' the same distinction and effect take place (c). If the thing to be furnished is specific, and capable of identification, as the very thing to be furnished, it will be at the buyer's risk; if indefinite, the risk will remain with the seller (d).

(2.) If the sale be indefinite, as of a quantity of goods, no part of that species of goods in the dealer's warehouse being specifically the buyer's, a duty on such goods unsold will fall on the buyer (e). A mere spes may be sold, as the cast of a net (jactus retis); a hope of succession (f); the goodwill of a trade or shop (g). 'The application of the Sale of Goods Act to contracts of sale of such subjects as a spes or chance is excluded by the definition of "goods" (§ 62); but the terms of the contract may, as they have usually been held to do in English cases, apply to the subject of the spes, and to be conditional or contingent sales of it, or sometimes, as would be the case in the Civil Law illustration of jactus retis, contracts for work and labour (h).'

(3.) A commodity sold by measurement or weight may be very different, according to the standard used in different countries; and either the standard or the place should be fixed (i). 'If the intention of the parties with regard to weight, measure, coinage, etc., is left in doubt (i.e. is not to be ascertained from the terms of the contract, or the circumstances, or from usage), the presumption is that the weight, etc., of the place of fulfilment is intended, not only because that is what the parties most probably had in view, but because adjustment by those weights, etc., will generally be more easily effected (k).'

(4.) All British contracts are ruled by the imperial standard; the Winchester bushel, Scottish ell, and all other local and customary measures being abolished (l). 'All contracts and dealings in the United Kingdom are deemed to be made and had according to one of the imperial weights or measures or to some multiple or aliquot part thereof, and if not so made or had, are void (m). The nullity and penalties of the Act do not apply to the sale of an article in a vessel not represented as containing any amount of imperial measure, nor to the possession of a vessel not used or intended for use as a measure (n). So it has been held that the sale of spirits by the "threepence worth" or by the "glass" (o), or by a pewter measure not of the name or denomination of an imperial measure, though containing a certain proportion of such a measure (p), is not within the 24th section of the Act, which imposes a penalty on the use of weights or measures not of the denomination of a Board of Trade standard.'

(5.) Rules as to Quantity.—If the quantity be vaguely expressed (as about 300 quarters of corn), a disproportioned excess is not to be held as sold, 'but the vendor is allowed a certain moderate and reasonable latitude in the performance (q).' (6.) If an order be given for several articles, the buyer is entitled to consider it as one order, and to refuse to accept any one article unless the whole be sent (r). 'But the rule is different if the nature of the contract contemplates the possible delivery of a part only, or the buyer acquiesces in the delivery of a part as fulfilment of the contract to that extent (s).

'The rules as to delivery of the wrong quantity are now as follows:—(1) Where the seller delivers a quantity of goods less than he contracted to sell, the buyer may reject them; but if the buyer accepts the goods so delivered, he must pay for them at the contract rate. (2) Where the seller delivers a quantity of goods larger than he contracted to sell, the buyer may accept the goods included in the contract and reject the rest, or he may reject the whole. If the buyer accepts the whole of the goods so delivered, he must pay at the contract rate. (3) Where the seller delivers the goods ~~he~~ contracted to sell mixed with goods of a different description not included in the contract, the buyer may accept the goods which are in accordance with the contract and reject the rest, or he may reject the whole.

(4) These provisions are subject to any usage of trade, special agreement, or course of dealing between the parties (t).'

III. c. 31), which authorised sellers under previous contracts to add the amount of the duty to the price of undelivered goods.

(t) Sale of Goods Act, 1893, § 30.

92. Price.—The rule 'in Scotland was': No price, no sale. There 'might' be donation, transference, engagement, but no sale without a price stipulated (a). If there be a material error as to the price, it is no sale (b). 'Yet, where the contract had been conclusively settled by delivery of the goods sold, the parties were presumed in law to have had in contemplation the reasonable value of the thing sold (c).'

(1.) The price must, 'prior to 1894,' be certain, or, 'but both formerly and under the Sale of Goods Act it may by the contract be,' referred to such standard or criterion as to fix it beyond question (d); as to the Sheriff-fairs fixing the price of grain (e); or the award of a third party (f); or even of one of the parties, subject to the control of equity (g); or the market or current price at a particular time or place; and if no place or time be fixed, the price at the time and place of receiving the order or settling the bargain will be presumed (h). The price may by the bargain be made to vary according to events (i).

'The result of these qualifications of the rule that there is no contract unless the price can be made certain was to make the rule of little practical importance where delivery had taken place. And in this way our law hardly differed from the law of England. But in the case of goods to be acquired or manufactured by the seller (future goods—executory contracts) a contract of sale could not exist unless a price were fixed. The Sale of Goods Act has now assimilated our law to the law of England, enacting as follows:—(1) The price may be fixed by the contract, or may be left to be fixed in some manner thereby agreed, or may be determined by the course of dealing between the parties. (2) Where the price is not so determined, the buyer must pay a reasonable price; and that is a question of fact dependent on the circumstances of each particular case (k). (3) When the price is to be fixed by the valuation of a third party, and he cannot or does not make such valuation, the agreement is avoided; but the buyer must pay a reasonable price for any part of the goods that have been delivered and appropriated. If the valuation is prevented by the fault of the buyer or seller, the other party may maintain an action for damages (l).

'Unless a different intention appears from the terms of the contract, stipulations as to time of payment are not of the essence of a contract of sale (m).'

(2.) The price must not be illusory, for that is donation (n).

(3.) The price must be in money, or what passes as such, otherwise it is barter, not sale (o). Between these two contracts, however, there is no essential distinction (p). 'All contracts and dealings relating to money, or involving payment of or liability to pay money, must be made according to the coins which are current and legal tender under the Coinage Act, 1870, and not otherwise, unless made according to the currency of some British possession (q).'

94. (1.) Implied Condition as to Quality; and Warranty (a).—The implied conditions may relate either to the quality and state of the goods, or to the mode and terms of payment of the price.

(a) See further, § 111 and 121.

94A. 'The fundamental undertaking (a) in a contract of sale is that "the goods shall correspond with the description" (b), i.e. the description contained in the contract. This, of course, will generally apply to executory contracts, and not often to sales of specific goods. But the statute adds, "If the sale be by sample, as well as by description, it is not sufficient that the bulk of the goods corresponds with the sample, if the goods do not also correspond with the description" (c).'

95. It is a condition implied, that the goods shall be fit for the purpose for which they are bought (a), and such as they are represented or taken to be, according to the fair understanding of the parties (b). In applying this principle, two cases are to be distinguished,—one where the thing bought is produced to the buyer, and under his examination; the other where it is not seen or examined by the buyer.

96. Caveat Emptor.—Where the buyer has himself seen and examined the 'specific' goods, the general rule (and it is so in England as well as in Scotland) is, Caveat emptor—the buyer's eye is his merchant; once approved, the subject is held unexceptionable, unless fraud shall be proved against the seller (a). But to this rule there are exceptions:—

The rule does not apply if the 'specific' commodity have not been seen, or an opportunity given to the buyer of satisfying himself; or if the seller knew of any material defect not obvious, and concealed it; or if any misrepresentation have been made, or statement framed to mislead (b). 'On the sale of specific goods, whether by sample or in bulk, the purchaser must take the goods though they do not possess some quality which he thought they possessed, unless either there was a warranty that they had that quality, or being specifically described, they do not on trial answer the description in the contract (§ 97), or the mistake was induced by the active fraud (not the mere silence) of the seller, or the defect is of the kind mentioned in § 98, infra (c).'

97. If the fault be latent, although the buyer should see the commodity, there 'was,' by the law of Scotland, an implied warranty (a); the goods 'might,' on discovery of the fault, be rejected; and if the article 'perished' by such latent fault, the buyer 'was' relieved from payment, or entitled to have back the price (b). 'It was, however, and still is, the law of Scotland, that specific goods sold by description may be rejected even when the buyer has seen and examined them, if they turn out to be different in kind from those described, provided that the difference was not apparent on inspection, e.g. when one sells flax yarn, and delivers yarn partly consisting of jute. In such a case the vendor does not fulfil the terms of his contract (c).'

The English rule formerly was, that a sound price implies the warranty of sound goods; but this is now departed from, as too elusory; and in all defects, even latent, the buyer is 'now' held 'in the law of England and also of Scotland' to be aware of the possibility of their existence, and to take the risk, unless either an express warranty is taken, or there is fraud on the part of the seller. 'In short, there is no implied warranty against latent defects in the sale of a definite existing article, the actual condition of which may be ascertained by either party (d).'

97A. 'Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856.—An attempt was made to assimilate the law of Scotland to that of England by 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, § 5, now repealed (a), by which it was enacted, that "where goods (b) shall, after the passing of this Act, be sold, the seller, if at the time of the sale he was without knowledge (c) that the same were defective or of bad quality, shall not be held to have warranted their quality or sufficiency; but the goods, with all faults, shall be at the risk of the purchaser, unless the seller shall have given an express warranty (d) of the quality or sufficiency of such goods, or unless the goods have been expressly sold for a specified and particular purpose (e), in which case the seller shall be considered, without such warranty, to warrant that the same are fit for such purpose."

(b) Under the term "goods," horses are included. Young v. Giffen, 1858; 21 D. 87. This statutory rule, as well as the rule of the English law which it was intended to embody, applied only to sales of a specific corpus, or definite part of a corpus, which is at the risk of the buyer after the sale, not to the sale of a quantity of goods by measure and weight, the specific goods not being pointed out; nor did it apply to a case where the goods are of a different description from those about which the parties contracted (supra, § 97). *Jaffé v. 97B. Sale of Goods Act, 1893, on the Rule of Caveat Emptor and Exceptions.—‘The fourteenth clause of this Act sets forth the present law. Subject to the provisions of this Act and of any statute on that behalf, there is no implied warranty or condition as to the quality or fitness for any particular purpose of goods supplied under a contract of sale (a), except as follows:—

‘(1) Where the buyer, expressly or by implication makes known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods are required, so as to show that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment, and the goods are of a description (i.e. kind) which it is in the course of the seller's business to supply (whether he be the manufacturer or not),—there is an implied condition that the goods shall be reasonably fit for such purpose (b). But when an article is sold under its patent or other trade name, there is no such implied condition (c).

‘(2) When goods are bought by description from a seller who deals in goods of that description (i.e. kind), whether he be the manufacturer or not, there is an implied condition that they shall be of merchantable quality (d). If, however, the buyer has examined them, there is no implied condition as regards defects which such examination ought to have revealed.

‘(3) An implied warranty or condition as to quality or fitness for a particular purpose may be annexed by usage of trade (e).

‘(4) An express warranty or condition does not negative a warranty or condition implied by the Act, unless inconsistent therewith.’

(b) Jones v. Bright, and other cases in § 95 (b), and § 97A (e).

(d) Jones v. Just, and cases in § 98 (a) (b).

(e) Jones v. Bowden, 4 Taunt. 847; 14 R. R. 683.

98. When the goods are afterwards to be furnished or sent to the buyer, they may be rejected on implied warranty: either where they are not merchantable according to the denomination of the commodity (a); or where, sold by sample, they do not, when sent in bulk, correspond with the sample (b). ‘When a manufacturer or dealer supplies an article which he makes or produces, to be applied to a particular purpose, or which the buyer cannot see, so that in either case the buyer trusts to his judgment, there is an implied warranty that it shall be reasonably fit for that purpose or merchantable (c). When goods are bought without inspection from a manufacturer who does not hold himself out as dealing in such goods otherwise than as a manufacturer, and whose goods have no special brand or character, it has been held in England that it is, and in Scotland that it is not, an implied term in the contract that the seller shall furnish goods manufactured by himself (d). And it is thought, and certainly was intended by the Legislature, that the effect of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, was to make the Scotch rule generally applicable (e).’

In order to raise this implied warranty by sample, it is not sufficient that a part of the goods shall have been drawn and exhibited; unless it is expressly referred to in the bargain as such, and due precaution taken for identifying the sample. But although the sale be not properly by sample, a specimen produced to the buyer, as indicating the quality, may be referred to as evidence of deceit or error (f).

99. In order to avail himself of warranty, the buyer must make his challenge instantly, or without unreasonable delay, otherwise he is liable for the full price. 'He is not bound actually to return the goods, or even to place them in neutral custody, but only to make an unequivocal rejection (a).' (1.) Where the fault is known or manifest, if the challenge be not immediate 'and distinct,' the legal inference is that the buyer is satisfied (b). (2.) Where the fault is not manifest at first sight, but easily discoverable by such examination as a merchant skilled in the commodity naturally bestows in buying, he must immediately investigate and determine (c); and if he break bulk, or make use of the article, 'or do anything which infers an election to accept the goods,' he is barred from objecting to it (d). 'In every case the right of rejecting the goods and rescinding the contract must be exercised "within a reasonable time." What is a reasonable time is a question of fact (e). But a buyer is not barred from rejecting goods as disconform to order by the mere fact that he has sold or used part of them before discovery of the defect (f).' (3.) Sometimes there is a certain time allowed by custom for examination (g). 'Indeed, in all cases the buyer must have a fair opportunity of examining the articles furnished to him (h); and he may even experiment on a small quantity, if no more than absolutely necessary, for the purpose of testing their quality (i). And in some executory contracts, as in the case of machinery to be erected on the premises of the buyer, a reasonable time must be allowed for trial (k).' (4.) Immediate inspection is more especially required when the commodity may alter by keeping (l). (5.) When in an executory contract goods have been returned as disconform to order, proof of conformity is necessary to sustain action by the seller (m). 'In an executory contract in which payment is made by instalments, and constructive delivery and appropriation take place as the work proceeds, the purchaser may claim damages for breach of contract even after he has taken full possession and without rejecting the article (n).'

99A. 'Until 1892 there was by the law of Scotland no right to retain the goods and claim an abatement of the price as in the actio quanti minoris of the Roman law, unless in the case of fraud (a), or of a special bargain or usage (b). But it is now enacted "that in Scotland failure by the seller to perform any material part of the contract of sale is a breach of contract, and entitles the buyer either within a reasonable time after delivery to reject the goods and treat the contract as repudiated, or to retain the goods and treat the failure to perform such material part as a breach which may give rise to a claim for compensation or damages" (c). A purchaser who elects to reject must not break bulk or use or consume the goods, but must act in accordance with the rules stated above (§ 99 (f)) in regard to rejection (d). If the rejection when made was justified by the seller's breach of contract, but the buyer by his subsequent conduct is barred from availing himself of it, he is not entitled to claim damages under this alternative clause (e). But if it is found in legal proceedings, or afterwards appears, that the rejection was not originally justified by the seller's breach of contract, then, as there was really no valid rejection, the buyer may still elect to claim damages (f).'

100. (2.) Implied Conditions as to Payment of the Price.—"When the bargain is simple and without special stipulation, the buyer's obligation is to pay immediately, and the seller is entitled to demand and have action for payment on offering delivery of the thing, or proving the delivery made, or on showing that the thing has perished by accident" (a). By the Sale of Goods Act, "it is the duty of the seller to deliver the goods, and of the buyer to accept and pay for them, in accordance with the terms of the contract of sale" (b). Unless otherwise agreed, delivery of the goods and payment of the price are concurrent conditions, i.e. the seller must be ready and willing to give possession of the goods to the buyer in exchange for the price, and the buyer must be ready and willing to pay the price in exchange for the possession of the goods (c). And where the property has passed and the buyer wrongly neglects or refuses to pay in terms of the contract, the seller has an action for the price (d). If the property has not passed, the seller has an action of damages; the measure of damages is the estimated loss directly and naturally resulting in the ordinary course of events from the buyer's breach of contract (e); and where there is an available market, that is prima facie the difference between the market price at the time or times when the goods ought to have been accepted, or if there was no fixed time at the time of refusal (f).'

Sale on Credit—Insolvency of Buyer.—

Where the sale is on credit, solvency is an implied condition; and if the buyer fail, or be vergens ad inopiam, the seller may refuse to proceed (g). 'In the case of declared insolvency, the seller's right to retain (h) or to stop in transitu (i) is clear; but in modern practice the question has not been raised with one alleged to be vergens ad inopiam (k). The mere insolvency of the buyer does not rescind the contract. His creditors (or trustee) may still, on fulfilling his obligations under the contract, obtain delivery of the goods (l). The rule settled in England is, that if one who has become openly insolvent, or his creditors, or trustee, fail within a reasonable time to intimate their intention to carry out a current contract, the other party may treat it as rescinded (m).

101. The usage of trade is an implied condition in sale, as in every mercantile contract (a), and as such held to be incorporated in the agreement. So a sale, in simple terms, implies the usual credit given in that line of trade. But it is an exception to this rule, that if the usage be local, and/or unknown to one of the parties, it (b) has no effect; and that no custom will be admitted in contradiction of the express words of the contract (c).

101A. '(3.) Warranty implied in Trade Mark.—By 51 and 52 Vict. c. 28, § 17, repealing 25 and 26 Vict. c. 88, § 19, 20, on the sale or contract for the sale of any goods to which a trade mark or mark or trade description has been applied, the seller is deemed to warrant that the trade mark is a genuine trade mark, and not forged or falsely applied, or that the trade description is not a false description within the meaning of the Act; unless the contrary be expressed in a signed writing delivered at the time of the sale or contract to and accepted by the vendee. Trade description includes any statement of weight, measure, etc., or of the place or country where the goods sold were made or produced, or the material or mode of manufacture, etc. (a).'

(a) See further in the Act.

102. Express or Special Conditions.—These are employed to introduce some point of agreement not naturally implied in the contract, or to alter what is so implied. They may either regulate the payment of the price; or arrange the delivery; or suspend or dissolve the sale in particular events; or give special warranties.

102A. Reservation of Right of Disposal.—Where there is a contract for the sale of specific goods, or where goods are subsequently appropriated to the contract, the seller may, by the terms of the contract or appropriation, reserve the right of disposal of the goods until certain conditions are fulfilled. In such case, notwithstanding the delivery of the goods to the buyer, or to a carrier or other bailee or custodian for the purpose of transmission to the buyer, the property does not pass until the conditions imposed by the buyer are fulfilled (a).

Where goods are shipped, and by the bill of lading the goods are deliverable to the order of the seller or his agent, the seller is prima facie deemed to reserve the right of disposal (b).

Where the seller draws on the buyer for the price, and transmits the bill of exchange and bill of lading to the buyer together, to secure acceptance or payment of the bill of exchange, the buyer is bound to return the bill of lading if he does not honour the bill of exchange, and if he wrongfully retains the bill of lading the property in the goods does not pass to him (c). So a stipulation for payment in cash against bill of lading "is strong evidence of an intention that the property shall not pass; but the question is one of intention to be determined from all the circumstances" (d).'

'Stipulations as to time, other than those relating to time of payment, are generally of the essence of the contract (e); but it depends on the terms of the contract (f).

'Where under a contract of sale the price is payable on a day certain, irrespective of delivery, and the buyer wrongfully neglects or refuses to pay such price, the seller may maintain an action for the price, though the property has not passed and the goods have not been appropriated to the contract (g).'

103. (1.) Express Conditions as to Payment (a).—'Unless a different intention appears from the terms of the contract, stipulations as to time of payment are not deemed to be of the essence of the contract of sale (b). The accustomed credit, held to be incorporated in the contract by force of usage, may by special agreement be rejected; if so rejected tempestive (c). An agreement to pay at six months, by a bill at two or three months, has been held credit at nine months (d). A special condition of "ready money" suspends the passing of the property even in a question with creditors (e).

104. If it be stipulated that "a bill shall be given for the price," it is generally sufficient to send the bill without undue delay, reasonable time being taken to examine the goods; but if stipulated "to be sent in course," that is an absolute condition (a).

105. The stipulation of "a bill" imports the buyer's own bill (a). But the seller may object to the credit if the sale be made by a broker for the seller, provided the seller intimate his dissent as soon as he has an opportunity of inquiring into the buyer's credit (b); or if there have been undue concealment; or if there be a change on the condition of the buyer between the time of the bargain and the time of tendering the bill (c).

(c) Brandt & Co., § 102A (c). See § 100.

106. The stipulation of "a discountable bill" imports such a bill, in time and in credit, as will produce money at the banks.

107. The stipulation of "an approved bill" seems to import only a bill to which no reasonable objection can be made, and which ought to be approved; otherwise everything would be left to the caprice of the party (a).

108. (2.) Express Conditions as to Delivery.—Where the goods are sold "on arrival of" (or "by") a certain ship, 'or "ex ship" A (a),' it is a conditional sale, binding only if there shall be such arrival 'of the ship, and if the goods are on board on her arrival, there being a double condition precedent.' In construing all such stipulations, the object is to find the true and honest meaning of the contract, which is the business of a jury (b). 'If the contract asserts that the goods are on board the vessel named, there is only one condition precedent, the arrival of the vessel (c). Where the delivery is to be "on arrival, not beyond" a certain day, it is a condition that the goods shall arrive in time for delivery on that day (d). Where there is an entire contract for a quantity to be delivered within a certain time, and part is delivered, the buyer may return that part if the rest be not delivered; and as this privilege endures till expiration of the term, the seller cannot sooner demand payment. But if the term pass without return of the part delivered, the seller has action for the price of what is delivered (e).

'Instalment Deliveries.—Where there is a contract for the sale of goods to be delivered by stated instalments, which are to be separately paid for, and the seller makes defective deliveries in respect of one or more instalments, or the buyer neglects or refuses to take delivery of or pay for one or more instalments, it is a question in each case, depending on the terms of the contract and the circumstances of the case, whether the breach of contract is a repudiation of the whole contract, or a severable breach giving rise to a claim for compensation only (f).

'Unless otherwise agreed, a buyer is not bound to accept delivery by instalments (g), nor to demand it (h).'

109. Suspensive Conditions, if expressly stipulated, may delay the sale, and (even against creditors) bar the passing of the property, though delivered (a). 'The condition suspends the contract of sale, and delivery, unless it takes place in such circumstances as to infer waiver of the condition, is not referable to a pure and absolute contract, and therefore does not pass the property (b).'

(1.) Goods 'on Approbation or' on Sale and Return.—This is a sale either (1) on approval 'of the goods' generally, or within a certain time; in which case the sale is suspended (though the seller may be bound) till the buyer have declared his option (c): or (2) 'it is' an arrangement with retail dealers, in which goods are sent to them 'by wholesale dealers' on an agreement that those 'goods' only are to be 'held as' transferred which the former can dispose of. In such contracts this is a legitimate condition suspensive (d). But such a case must always be viewed as subject to the law of reputed ownership (e).

(2.) Goods on Hire with Option to buy.—Goods or furniture or other things may be taken on hire, with an option to keep them as sold at a price (f).

'When an owner parts with possession of his moveable property—a pianoforte, a sewing machine, a thrashing mill, or a quantity of furniture—and a question arises with the creditors of the possessor, it is necessary to inquire what is the real nature of the contract. A sale on credit, with a collusive agreement for a hypothec for the price, may be unavailing (g). But a bona fide sale, under the condition that the property shall not pass until a certain sum has been paid, whether expressed as hire payable periodically, or as a price payable by instalments, does not transfer the property until the condition is purified; and the seller is preferred to the property against the buyer or others claiming under him. The doctrine of reputed ownership does not apply if the possession can be ascribed to a known and definite contract (h).

'But this state of the law is now subject to the provisions of the 25th section of the Sale of Goods Act, 1893, and the 9th section of the Factors Act, 1889 (applied to Scotland by the Factors (Scotland) Act, 1890), which are nearly in the same terms. It is enacted that where a person, having sold goods, continues or is in possession of the goods or of the documents of title to the goods, the delivery or transfer by him, or by a mercantile agent acting for him, of the goods or documents of title, under any sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof, to any person receiving the same in good faith and without notice of the previous sale, shall have the same effect as if the person making the delivery or transfer were expressly authorised by the owner of the goods to make it (i).

'Where a person, having bought or agreed to buy goods, obtains with the consent of the seller possession of them or of the documents of title, the delivery or transfer by him, or by a mercantile agent acting for him, of the goods or documents of title, under any sale, pledge, or other disposition thereof, to any person receiving the same in good faith and without notice of any lien or other right of the original seller in respect of the goods, shall have the same effect as if the person making the transfer or delivery were a mercantile agent in possession of the goods or documents of title with the owner's consent (k). This enactment overrides many of the decisions above cited.

(k) Ib. § 25 (2). A hire-purchase agreement, so expressed that the hirer is not obliged to buy, but has only an option to buy, and may terminate the agreement by returning the thing hired, is not a sale or agreement to sell, and so is not affected by the Act, and the owner may recover the article from anyone taking through the hirer. Helby v. Matthews, 1895; A. C. 471.

110. Dissolving Conditions have effect only against the party and his heirs, not against creditors (a).

(a) Pothier, Oblig. No. 224. Contrast the sounder doctrine of Stair, 1 Stair, 14. § 5, with the more questionable doctrine of Erskine, 3 Ersk. 3. § 11. 1 Bell's Com. 238-39 (259, 260, M'L's ed.). Supra, § 47-50.

111. Special Warranties (a).—These are given where the party, instead of trusting to the implied obligation, requires the condition to be expressly described and warranted. They become absolute qualifications of the contract, whether they relate to the mode of payment, or to the quality of the commodity, or to the time of delivery. So every affirmation of quality made to the buyer as a ground of reliance is a warranty (b). 'The rule is, that every affirmation at the time of sale of personal chattels is a warranty, provided it appears to have been so intended (c).' But the eulogies which dealers are accustomed to make of their goods are not to be received as warranties. They are understood in the ordinary intercourse of trade as boastful recommendations, which the buyer is to take or reject according to his prudence (d). If, however, the article be expressly purchased to answer a particular purpose, that is a warranty (e). If the article be taken expressly "with all faults," that will not save the seller from a warranty express or necessarily implied (f).

(a) See above, § 95 and § 97. As to warrandice against Eviction, see below, § 121.

(b) Per Buller, J., in Pasley v. Freeman, 3 T. R. 59; 1 Ill. 208. Button v. Corder, 7 Taunt. 405. Shepherd v. Kain, 5 B. & Ald. 240; 1 Ill. 100; 24 R. R. 344. There is an important distinction between warranties in the contract of Insurance and warranties in Sale. In the former, no question is admitted as to the materiality of any deviation from the warranty (see below, § 475 et seq.); in the latter, materiality seems to be essential to the plea of breach of warranty.

112. Obligations of the Seller.—The obligations of the one party form the rights of the other rights and obligations being in all contracts counterparts.

113. (1.) Delivery.—The primary duty of the seller is to deliver the thing sold (a).

(a) See further, § 1299 et seq.

114. He is bound to deliver (a) the thing so as to complete the transfer; that being the great object of the contract to the buyer. 'This obligation may be specifically enforced (b).' And so there is an implied warranty that the seller has a good title enabling him to sell (c), 'unless the circumstances show that the parties only intended to pass such interest as the seller himself had in the thing sold (d).' But possession of moveables presumes property; and in the rapid intercourse of trade, the buyer of goods is not allowed to stop the bargain on pretence of want of title, or on mere doubts as to the possibility of a challenge (e). But a claim of warrandice arises on eviction (f). 'The contract of sale also includes, unless the circumstances show a different intention, an implied warranty that the goods shall be free from any charge or incumbrance in favour of a third party, not declared or known to the buyer when the contract was made (g).

Statutory Rules as to Delivery (h).—Whether it is for the buyer to take possession of the goods, or for the seller to send them to the buyer, is a question depending in each case on the contract express or implied. Apart from any such contract, the place of delivery is the seller's place of business if he have one, and, if not, his residence: Provided that specific goods which the parties know to be in some other place when the contract is made are to be delivered there (i). Where the goods are in the hands of a third person, there is no delivery unless and until such third person acknowledges to the buyer that he holds the goods on his behalf; but this enactment does not affect the operation of the issue or transfer of documents of title (k). Unless otherwise agreed, the expenses of and incidental to putting the goods in a deliverable state must be borne by the seller (l).

115. Time of Delivery.—The delivery must be made at the time and in the manner stipulated in the contract (a); and if there be no stipulation as to time, the delivery must be immediately on the buyer performing all the conditions stipulated, reasonable time being allowed to prepare for the delivery (b), 'and notice given of such performance, if it be not a matter within the privity and knowledge of the seller, as, e.g., the arrival of the buyer's ship (c).

'If by the contract the seller is bound to send the goods to the buyer, but no time for sending them is fixed, the seller is bound to send them within a reasonable time (d). Demand or tender of delivery may be treated as ineffectual unless made at a reasonable hour, what is a reasonable hour being a question of fact (e).'

116. Sometimes the goods are stipulated to remain with the seller till convenient for the buyer to remove them; in which case the seller is truly custodian for the buyer. The perishing of them without fault of the seller will discharge his obligation to deliver (a), and the goods to certain effects are held delivered. 'So if a specific thing, or a particular portion of a specific thing, be sold, it is a condition of the contract that the thing (e.g. a field of potatoes to be grown) shall be in existence at the intended time of delivery; and if it never come into existence, or perish without fault of the seller, he is not liable (b).' But if they are allowed to remain till the term of payment has arrived, and the buyer fail, or his bill for the price be dishonoured, the seller may retain the goods (c), 'unless he is barred by having given his assent, express or implied, to a sub-sale previously intimated to him (d). This result is effected in virtue of the vendor's lien for the price; and it is held that the lien is not lost, or that it revives on the buyer's insolvency, even when he has relinquished it by the terms of his contract, as by agreeing to hold as bailee for the buyer (e). The vendor's lien operates even when the buyer is not insolvent, if the period of credit expires and the goods are still in the vendor's possession (f); also when the goods have been sold without any stipulation as to credit. These provisions are all repeated in the Sale of Goods Act (g), with this addition that the seller may exercise his lien, even if he is in possession as agent or bailee or custodian for the buyer (h), and that whether the buyer is solvent or insolvent.'

117. Place of Delivery.—If a place be fixed at which delivery is to be made, the goods must be delivered at that place; and they are held as still the seller's till brought thither for delivery, the intermediate risk being with the seller (a). If no place be fixed, 'the place of delivery is the seller's place of business, and if he have none, his residence. But if specific goods are sold and known to the parties to be at some other place,' the delivery is to be where the goods are at the time of purchase (b). If the buyer be at a distance the seller's duty and risk end with delivery to the proper carrier (c). It is sometimes a matter of doubt what is the point or port of delivery; and on this it may depend by what rule the measurement or weight is to be adjusted. Thus a cargo of timber sold at so much per English cubic foot is a very different bargain (in consequence of the difference of measurement) if to be measured at Rotterdam or at Aberdeen (d). The question will depend on the terms of the order as understood by merchants, and it is for the jury to fix it on proof of mercantile usage and understanding.

118. If the goods are to be sent to a distance, and no directions be given, the rule is, that they are to be delivered in the usual way (a). If any directions be given by the buyer as to the carriage, they must be followed as far as possible (b); and in that case the buyer must stand to the loss (c). At all events, the goods must be despatched with due care (d), so as to fix a demand on the carrier (e), to secure safe carriage (f), and to enable the buyer to insure (g).

118A. Statutory Rules as to Delivery to a Carrier.—'When the seller is authorised or required to send the goods to the buyer, delivery to a carrier, whether named by the buyer or not, for the purpose of transmission to the buyer, is prima facie deemed to be delivery to the buyer (a). Unless otherwise authorised by the buyer, the seller must make a reasonable contract with the carrier on behalf of the buyer, having regard to the circumstances and the nature of the goods, failing which, loss or damage in transit entitles the buyer to decline to treat the delivery to the carrier as a delivery to himself, or he may hold the seller liable in damages (b). Unless otherwise agreed, where goods are sent by the seller to the buyer by a route involving sea-transit, under circumstances in which it is usual to insure, the seller must give such notice to the buyer as may enable him to insure; and if he fails to do so, the goods are at his risk during the sea-transit (c). Where the seller agrees to deliver at his own risk at a place other than that where they are when sold, the buyer, unless it is otherwise agreed, takes any risk of deterioration in the goods necessarily incident to the course of transit (d).'

118B. Acceptance and Examination.—'Where goods are delivered to the buyer, which he has not previously examined, he is not deemed to have accepted them unless and until he has had a reasonable opportunity of examining them for the purpose of ascertaining whether they are in conformity with the contract (a). Unless otherwise agreed, the seller when he tenders delivery is bound, on request, to afford the buyer a reasonable opportunity of examining the goods for the said purpose (b).

'The buyer is deemed to have accepted the goods when he has intimated to the seller that he has accepted them, or when the goods have been delivered to him and he does any act in relation to them which is inconsistent with the ownership of the seller, or when after the lapse of a reasonable time he retains the goods without intimating his rejection of them (c). In the absence of special agreement, the buyer who refuses to accept delivered goods is not bound to return them to the seller. It is enough if he intimates unconditionally his refusal to accept (d).'

Buyer's Neglect or Refusal of Delivery.—'When the seller is ready and willing to deliver, and requests the buyer to take delivery, and the buyer does not within a reasonable time take delivery, he is liable to the seller for any loss so occasioned, and also for a reasonable charge for the care and custody of the goods. But this enactment does not affect the seller's rights where the buyer's neglect or refusal amounts to a repudiation of the contract (e).'

(b) The Act, § 34 (2).

(c) The Act, § 35. Supra, § 99, esp. notes (a), (d), (k), as to rejection; for acceptance is a material question chiefly in regard to rejection. The cases in England as to acceptance under the Statute of Frauds are not necessarily in point in dealing with acceptance in the sense of the text.

119. If the goods are to be delivered free on board (a) a foreign ship, it is sufficient if the seller put them on board such ship. He is not bound, when he has an adverse interest, to deliver them into the buyer's hand, nor to transfer them in the books of the warehouse where they lie (b).

(a) See Jack v. Roberts, 1865; 3 Macph. 554. Glengarnock Iron Co. v. Cooper & Co., 1896; 22 R. 672. Benjamin on Sales, 315.

120. Buyers' Remedies.—On the seller failing to deliver, the buyer may, at his choice, annul the bargain, or insist for performance with damages (a).

'Where the seller wrongfully neglects or fails to deliver, the buyer may maintain an action for damages for non-delivery. The measure of damages is the estimated loss directly and naturally resulting in the natural course of events from the seller's breach of contract (b). Where there is an available market (c) for the goods, the measure of damages is to be ascertained prima facie by the difference between the contract price and the market or current price at the time or times when the goods ought to have been delivered, or if no time was fixed, then at the time of the refusal to deliver (d).

'In any action for breach of contract to deliver specific or ascertained goods, the Court may, if it thinks fit, on the application of the plaintiff, direct that the contract shall be performed specifically, without giving the seller the option of retaining the goods on payment of damages. The judgment or decree may be conditional, or upon such terms and conditions as to damages, payment of the price, and otherwise as to the Court may seem just; and the application may be made by the plaintiff at any time before judgment or decree. This provision is supplementary to and not in derogation of the right of specific implement in Scotland (e).

'Where there is a breach of warranty (i.e. in Scotland a failure to perform a material part of the contract (f)) by the seller, or where the buyer elects or is compelled to treat any breach of a condition on the part of a seller as a breach of warranty, the buyer is not by reason only of such breach of warranty entitled (in England) to reject the goods, but he may (1) set up against the seller the breach of warranty in diminution or extinction of the price, or (2) maintain an action against the seller for damages for breach of warranty (g). The measure of damages is the estimated loss directly and naturally arising in the ordinary course of events from the breach of warranty. In the case of breach of warranty of quality such loss is prima facie the difference between the value of the goods at the time of delivery and the value they would have had if they had answered to the warranty (h). The buyer may maintain a second action for the same breach of warranty if he has afterwards suffered further damage (i). This enactment does not prejudice or affect the buyer's right of rejection in Scotland as declared by the Act (k).'

121. (2.) Warrantice.—The secondary obligation of the seller is to warrant against eviction (a). This obligation on the seller is implied in sale, and consequent on eviction. Eviction is the loss of a thing, in whole or in part, to the buyer, by the judicial establishment of a right in another preferable to the seller's; or by such right being admitted by the seller; or by the emerging of an unquestionable burden on the subject purchased, which the buyer is compelled to discharge (b).

(b) 3 Ersk. 3. § 9. 1 Domat, t. 2. § 10. Pothier, Vente, Nos. 83, 85.

122. The obligation of warrantice is implied or express. Where a full price is paid, or what the parties consider as such, the warrantice is absolute. It is an engagement that the buyer shall be protected against eviction on any ground existing antecedently to the sale (a). To entitle the buyer to redress, there must be eviction; for it is only eviction that grounds an action of warrantice (b). The eviction must be ex defectu juris, not ex natura rei, nor proceeding from accident or violence (c). And it must be a loss, strictly speaking, not subsequent to the sale, as by a supervenient law (d). Partial loss must be indemnified, and burdens removed (e).

123. Warrantice from fact and deed is a more limited obligation, viz. protection against eviction by reason of the seller's own act or omission, past or future.

124. Simple warrantice protects the buyer only against the future act and deed of the seller.

125. Express warrantice is a special bargain altering the implied engagement. The buyer is entitled to redress on eviction, provided he shall have given notice of the challenge. And although he is not bound to defend himself before eviction (a), he is entitled to defend himself; and if he choose to do so, he will be held to undertake the risk of all omissions in his defence, with the expense of the contest.

126. The buyer, on eviction, may claim the whole loss and damage as at the time of eviction, deducting the intermediate profits drawn. But he is entitled only to such law expense as he may have bona fide laid out in defending himself, either with the assent of the seller, or without any offer on the seller's part to give instant indemnification, or to defend against eviction (a).

(a) Hill v. Yeaman, 1769; M. 16,631; Hailes, 328. These propositions are chiefly applicable to sales of land; as to the warrantice of which, see below, § 894. See also as to warrantice in the sale of debts, § 1469. Eichholz v. Bannister, supra, § 114; and Benjamin on Sales, 606, 620. A different view, viz. that in eviction of moveables the buyer can claim only the restitution of the sum paid for the right, is expressed by Stair and Bankton, and disapproved by Ersk., 2 Inst. 3. § 30. See § 895; and as to expenses, see Stephen v. L. Adv., 1878; 6 R. 282.

127. Obligations of the Buyer.—(1.) To pay the Price (a).—The chief obligation of the buyer is to pay the price, according to the terms express or implied; i.e. on delivery, or at the day appointed, or at the time when, by usage or the expiration of the accustomed credit, the price is due (b). The payment must be by a legal tender, if insisted on (c); or it may be in such notes as may have been received without objection, or which have been stipulated (d); 'and if made in accordance with the seller's request, as by post, it discharges the buyer, even if the money never reaches the seller's hands (e).' When instead of cash the buyer's note or a bank-cheque is taken in payment, and dishonoured, this does not discharge the buyer (f). 'If a cheque received in payment is not presented within reasonable time, and the drawer is prejudiced by the delay, the seller is held to have made the cheque his own, and the payment is absolute (g).' When bank-notes, or a bill or note of a third party, are offered and taken as cash, and without the indorsation of or recourse on the buyer, the seller has no remedy, if they should prove bad by insolvency of the bank or third party, unless the buyer had known of the insolvency, or had omitted some observance necessary for procuring payment (h). 'But the buyer is no longer responsible for the price (though he may be responsible on the security) if it can be shown that a bill or note, either his own or that of a third party, was taken with the intention that it should operate as immediate payment. This, however, must be clearly shown; and in the absence of agreement, express or implied, a payment by bill or note is understood to be conditional (i).' If the seller, on presenting the buyer's bank-cheque to the banker, agree to receive in payment a bill on a third person, the buyer is discharged, although that bill should be dishonoured (k). If the goods are to be paid for in ready money on delivery, delivery of them may be refused unless payment is so made; but if delivered without requiring payment, the buyer will be entitled to set off against a demand for the price a sum due to him by the seller (l). It is not, however, a waiver of the condition of ready money, if the buyer has been allowed to take away part of the goods without having paid for them (m). If the seller negotiate by discounting the bill of the buyer, it is held to certain effects as payment; so that the seller cannot after that retain the goods. But this circumstance will not deprive him of his right to come against the buyer on the bill being dishonoured (n).

128. (2.) To take Delivery.—The next obligation of the buyer is to take delivery of the goods, if they be in the condition stipulated or implied, at the time when the seller is bound to deliver (a). And he will be liable in warehouse rent, or damages, if he shall refuse to do so (b). 'Where there is an available market, the measure of damages is prima facie the difference between the contract price and the market price at the date of repudiation, the seller being bound, if he resell, to do so at once (c). It was laid down that judicial authority for reselling must be obtained (d); but this rule was not strictly observed, except in the case of horses, and in many cases it would be inconvenient in practice. It is only when the vendor means to claim damages that he must resell; and on the buyer's default he may in some circumstances retain the article to himself after notice, or he may store it for the vendee, and sue for the price and warehouse rent (e).

'Subject to the statutory provisions as to the transfer of bills of lading and similar documents of title (f), the unpaid seller of goods has by implication of law, whether the property in the goods has passed to the buyer or not—(1) a lien on the goods, or right to retain them, for the price while he is in possession of them (g); (2) in case of the buyer's insolvency, a right of stopping the goods in transitu after he has parted with the possession (h); (3) a right of resale as limited by the Sale of Goods Act. Where the property has not passed to the buyer, he has besides a right of withholding delivery similar to and coextensive with his rights of lien and stoppage in transitu (i).

'In Scotland, continuing a provision of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, the Sale of Goods Act allows a seller of goods to attach them while in his own hands or possession by arrestment or pawning, just as a third party can (k).

'Retention and stoppage in transitu are considered, in accordance with the original arrangement of this book, in Part II., Chap. II. (Of Delivery of Moveables), § 1299–1309.

'Here, as in the case of the seller's failure to deliver, when the contract is for future delivery, the date of breach with reference to which damages are assessed is the time of stipulated delivery, and not the time when notice of the intention to break the contract is given (l). But in either case action may, it seems, be brought upon repudiation, without waiting for the stipulated time of performance (m).'

(i) Sale of Goods Act (56 and 57 Vict. c. 71), § 39. The last provision is introduced because in England a man can have no "lien" over his own property. There seems to be no reason to doubt that, notwithstanding the repeal by § 60 of the Sale Clauses of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act of 1856, vendor's retention in Scotland is exactly equivalent to lien in England, and only secures the price.

129. Peculiarities in the Sale of Horses.—

The common rules apply to the sale of horses; the peculiarities relate to the implied or special warranty.

The general rule that all latent faults are under the implied condition of soundness, while obvious faults only are excepted from it, 'applied' in the sale of horses 'under the former law (a). The Mercantile Law Amendment Act and Sale of Goods Act, excluding implied warranties in sales, apply to the sale of horses (b). But where there is any express condition, it rules the question; while general and vague assurances are not to be held as express agreements altering the implied engagements. Warranty generally of soundness (whether implied as 'formerly' in Scotland, or express as in England) is an engagement of difficult construction (c). It seems to comprehend all constitutional diseases affecting the life of the horse; all accidental injuries which affect the life; all diseases and accidents attended with lameness; or rendering, or tending certainly to render, the horse prematurely unfit for work (d); all defects or bad habits, indicative or symptomatic of disease,—it being the disease, however, which in such case amounts to unsoundness (e). Opinions differ extremely as to slighter faults, whether they amount to unsoundness, as temporary lameness (f). Bad corns, if concealed, have been held unsoundness (g); so running thrush (h); roaring, proceeding from organic defect; and crib-biting, when inveterate, have also been held unsoundness (i). 'While an ordinary cold or other ailment curable in a few days is not a breach of warranty of soundness (k), on the other hand, a purchaser is understood to go to market to buy an article of which he can have immediate use (l), and therefore a disease which is curable, but only with great care and protracted surgical treatment, may be unsoundness (m). Although, as has been indicated above, a general warranty of soundness does not bind a seller as to defects which are obvious, on the other hand a buyer who, relying upon it, omits to make a minute examination, is protected against defects which, though not apparent, might readily have been detected by such an inspection (n).'

Those faults relative to temper, steadiness, timidity, use, etc., which, however important, are not unsoundness, must be guarded against by express warranty; and it is a question of evidence, whether such engagement has been undertaken, and how far it has been complied with (o).

A horse in which a defect has been discovered, comprehended under the seller's engagement, must be returned immediately, or as soon as the fault is discovered, 'and after it might have been discovered with ordinary diligence, the right of rejection is determined'; or if there be a time limited 'during which the warranty is to subsist, or' within which the horse, if objected to, is to be returned, that makes the rule between the parties (p). 'If the seller denies the alleged unsoundness, and refuses to take back the horse, the buyer was held bound to place it in neutral custody until he should resell it (q). This, however, appears to be no longer necessary (though still expedient), the law being declared by the Sale of Goods Act, § 36 and 20 (r). But if the seller uses a horse so returned to him as his own (s), he is barred from suing for the price of it. So when a buyer refuses to receive or returns a horse sold to him, the seller, if he intends to claim damages for breach of contract, must place it in neutral custody and resell. It was formerly the practice to obtain a judicial warrant (t), but the present law only requires the unpaid seller to give notice to the buyer or alleged buyer, as in the case of other goods (u).'

130. Sales by Auction.—The contract of sale by auction is formed by the offer to buy and acceptance; the offer being by the bidding; the acceptance by the fall of the hammer (a), or by the running of a sand-glass, or by the judicial close of the biddings, by the judge (b) or auctioneer declaring the last offer to be accepted (c). 'Prima facie each lot is deemed to be the subject of a separate contract of sale (d). Until the acceptance by fall of hammer or otherwise, the bid may be retracted; and so also there is no implied contract by mere advertisement that all the articles advertised for sale will be exposed (e).'

(b) The "judge of the roup" is not an arbiter to decide all questions arising out of the sale, but only to see fairplay, and decide matters arising while the sale is going on. Strachan v. Auld, 1884; 11 R. 756.

(c) There is no reason why the vendor should not be his own auctioneer. Flint v. Woodin, 9 Hare, 622. See Jeffrey v. Aiken, 1826; 4 S. 722. Sugden, Vend. & Purch. 44.

(e) Harris v. Nickerson, 42 L. J. Q. B. 171; L. R. 8 Q. B. 286; where Warlow v. Harrison is questioned. See above, § 74.

131. (1.) The Exposure may be at the pleasure of the bidders, or at an upset price; and must in either case be so conducted that the subject may fall to the highest real bidder. Much doubt has arisen as to the lawfulness of biddings for the exposor. He may set a price below which the thing is not to be sold. This is best and most openly done by fixing an upset price; as is done by the judge in judicial sales, or in voluntary sales on the owner's estimate of the worth of the thing. After much doubt, it was at one time held as settled in England, that without fixing an upset price, the exposor might accomplish the same object by the defensive precaution of appointing one to bid for him in order to prevent the thing from being sold below a certain price; but that he could use no unfair means of enhancing the price, as by appointing more than one to bid for him, so as to give the appearance and excitement of a competition; or by allowing his bidder to go on for the purpose generally of taking advantage of the eagerness of competition (a). But that doctrine has been thrown into doubt, and all private interference considered as a fraud (b). In Scotland we condemn absolutely such interference, and do not adopt the rule of merely limiting the owner's interference to a fair defensive precaution for preventing a sale at an undervalue (c). It has been said that if there be no upset price, and no agreement to sell at the pleasure of the company, the owner may bid (d); but that is not law, or is at least too broadly laid down. A power may be reserved to the exposor to offer (e). But if the sale is declared to be "without reserve," or "at the pleasure of the company," the plain meaning and effect of this, even in England, is held to be, to bar all biddings in behalf of the seller (f). 'The remedy, where there has been unfair bidding by or on behalf of the exposor, is to reduce all the offers after the last bona fide offer, and to hold the person who made it to be the purchaser; not to reduce the sale in toto, if justice can be done otherwise (g).'

It is implied in fair exposure, that the description shall not be 'misleading or' deceitful (h).

Statutory Provisions.—The Sale of Goods Act, 1893, enacts:—Where a sale by auction is not notified to be subject to a right to bid on behalf of the seller, it shall not be lawful for the seller to bid himself, or to employ any person to bid at such sale, or for the auctioneer knowingly to take any bid from the seller or any such person. Any sale contravening this rule may be treated as fraudulent by the buyer (i).

'A sale by auction may be notified to be subject to a reserved or upset price, and a right to bid may also be reserved expressly by or on behalf of the seller, in which case, but not otherwise, the seller, or any one person on his behalf, may bid at the auction (k).'

132. (2.) The Biddings among the real bidders must be fair, and the competition not defeated or restrained by combination or collusion among them (a). It is the implied duty of the judge of the roup, or auctioneer, to give to offerers a fair opportunity of bidding (b).

Particular conditions as to biddings are frequently introduced in articles of sale: as, that the exposor shall be allowed one or more biddings (c); that each bidding shall exceed the preceding in a certain sum; that the time to be allowed for bidding shall be fixed by the expiration of a specified time, as the running of a sand-glass, etc. (d); and that other offerers besides the highest shall continue subject to the contract for a certain time, in case of the highest offerer failing.

This latter precaution is taken in sales of land; the offers are subscribed; and the rule is, that the stipulation being for the exposor's benefit, the offerers have no jus quæsitum, or right to insist on the bargain, if the highest offerer should fail; but if called upon by the exposor, they have the full benefit as well as burden of the contract (e). The pasting up of the conditions of sale on the auctioneer's box, or on the door or walls of the auction room, or the publication of them in printed catalogues to be had in the room, is sufficient notice of the conditions (f). And these conditions are not to be controlled by any verbal declaration of the auctioneer (g).

'The auctioneer is not responsible for a breach of the conditions of sale or for unfair interference, unless he has had knowledge of it (h). He is personally responsible for fulfilment of the contract if he does not disclose the vendor's name (i), or if from the terms of the contract it appears that he is dealing personally (k). If an auctioneer be employed to sell for ready money goods which he has in his possession, and if there be nothing to the contrary in the conditions of sale, it is presumed that he has authority to receive payment of the price (l). An auctioneer has no implied authority to warrant the goods entrusted to him for sale (m).'

133. Nature of the Contract (a).—By this contract, one party, in consideration of a certain hire, which the other engages to pay, agrees to give, during a certain time, or to a certain effect, the temporary use of a certain subject; or personal service and labour; or both combined (b).

(a) Consult 3 Ersk. Pr. 3. § 6. 1 Stair, 15. 3 Ersk. 3. § 14. Pothier, Pand. xix. t. 2. § 1. Ib. Cont. de Louage. 1 Domat, tit. 4. Jones on Bailments. Story on Bailments, 247. 2 Kent, Com. 582.

(b) This contract is in some degree analogous to sale. It is a sale of the use or service; but it is necessarily distinguished from sale, as being temporary instead of permanent, and as the risk does not shift, but remains with the Locator or Letter of the subject or of the labour.

134. The essentials of the contract are: a subject let and hired; the hire or consideration to be given for it; and the time or occasion during which the use or occupation, or benefit, is to be given, or which is to be allowed for the performance of the work.

135. The reciprocal obligations are: to deliver the thing for use, or to perform the service; to pay the hire; to restore or deliver the thing hired, or about which the work is to be performed, after the time is expired or the occasion past.

136. It is a mutual consensual contract, completed by consent, and proved (as in sale) by parole or written evidence (a): In land by writing; in moveables by parole; but if reduced to writing, the terms are not alterable by parole evidence (b).

(b) Pollock & Dickson v. M'Andrew, 1828; 7 S. 189. See below, § 2257.

I. HIRING OF MOVEABLES.

137. Description of this Contract.—The hiring of moveables is a reciprocal engagement to give and secure the use of the thing during a certain time or occasion, in consideration of a hire which the other engages to pay. It implies a thing to be used and returned. So, things which are consumed by use are not the proper subjects of hiring. These are called "fungibles," "quarum natura est ut aliæ aliarum ejusdem generis rerum vice fungantur: res quæ pondere, numero, et mensura constant." They are to be restored not identically, but in kind, by measure, weight, or number. The consumption of fungibles may be either natural and absolute, as of corn, wine, etc.; or civil, in which the substance is not altered, but the uses of it destroyed, as of paper for writing (a).

(a) 3 Ersk. 1. § 18. Pothier, Tr. du Prêt de Consommation, No. 23 et seq. 1 Bell's Com. 452 (481, M'L's ed.).

138. (1.) The Subject may be certain and definite, as the hire of a particular horse or ship; or it may to a certain extent be indeterminate, as in engaging freight with a shipping company, or in jobbing a carriage or horses.

139. (2.) The Use may be according to stipulation, or according to the implied use of the subject.

140. (3.) The Hire must be either certain, or ascertainable by reference to a standard.

141. Obligations of the Lessor.—These are analogous to those of sale. He is bound (1.) 'in letting an article for immediate use, and where nothing is to be done to it by the hirer to put it into a serviceable state,' to furnish the subject fit and free for use (a). 'And if he knows, or in the circumstances ought to know or to suspect, a defect in the thing let, making it unfit for the purpose for which it is let, and omits to inform the lessee of his knowledge or suspicion, or to make inquiry so as to verify or negative the suspicion, he is answerable in damages. But there is not in general an implied warranty against latent defects (b).' If it be a definite subject, he is discharged by the accidental perishing of it; this being also a discharge of the hire. A partial destruction by accident will entitle the lessee to abatement of the hire, or to abandon the contract. When the subject is indefinite, the obligation of the lessor is absolute to furnish the article, the destruction of any one not discharging the obligation. Insolvency is no defence to the lessor against an action for implement; but the demand resolves into damages, there being no jus in re to the lessee to be a ground of preference.

142. (2.) The lessor is also bound to warrant the use, and in so doing to protect the lessee in possession; to maintain the thing free from all faults or defects impeding the use, and in a state fit for the purpose stipulated; to indemnify the lessee for any loss occasioned by the want of a subject thus fit, or arising from any supervening incapacity, not from inevitable accident (a); and to suffer abatement or loss of hire if the subject by accident become wholly or partially useless (b).

(a) See Fowler v. Locke, 41 L. J. C. P. 99; 43 ib. 394; L. R. 7 C. P. 272; 10 ib. 90.

A bowing contract does not dispossess owner of cows in a question under Contagious Diseases Act. Robertson v. Local Authority of Perthshire, 1883; 10 R. Just. 68.

143. Obligations of the Lessee.—The lessee is bound to pay the hire stipulated or customary, with deduction of an abatement for temporary or partial deprivation of the use by defect or fault of the lessor (a).

(a) 3 Ersk. 3. § 16. Pothier, Louage, No. 134. Story, p. 274.

144. He is bound to take only the stipulated use, or that which is implied, according to the bona fide agreement of the parties, and to indemnify the lessor for all excessive use assumed (a).

See as to taking horses beyond the stipulated distance, Campbell, Shaw, and Gardners, infra. In the remarkable case of Seton v. Paterson, 1880, 8 R. 236, two judges of the Second Division held that one who hires a horse for an ordinary ride becomes liable for all accidents if he takes it into a grass field and gallops there. This seems to go beyond the cases referred to. See, however, Addison on Contr. 348, 349, as to gratuitous loans; and below, § 197.

145. He is bound to bestow due care on the subject (a), 'which implies the application of absolutely necessary repairs and remedies such as a prudent man would use for the preservation of his own property, with recourse against the lessor for the expense so incurred, if the occasion of it was not due to the lessee, and if due notice was given to the owner (b).' The hirer of animals is bound to provide them with food, to pay for the shoeing of horses let on time (c), and to restore them in proper condition, with the exception of fortuitous loss 'and of ordinary tear and wear (d),' when the time shall have expired or the occasion shall be over (e). 'A hirer is not liable for faults of ostlers, and persons to whom the horse has been properly entrusted (f). But he is liable for negligence of his own servant, even when acting outwith the scope of his employment (g). Where there is loss total or partial, the onus probandi is laid on the lessee in whose custody the thing was at the time (h).

By the English and American law, the onus of proving negligence is laid on the lessor.

II. HIRING OF ORDINARY LABOUR.

146. Nature of this Contract.—The contract of hiring of labour is an engagement, on the one part, to perform certain work, or to labour during a certain term, in consideration of a certain hire; on the other part, to pay that hire. It applies to common labour (a); to skilled labour; to care and custody; to carriage.

(a) See as to hiring of artisans, below, § 190.

147. This strictly is an engagement to do certain work on materials furnished to the workman, the material being "bailed" or delivered to the temporary possession of the workman, to have the labour bestowed on it. Where the thing is to be prepared of materials to be furnished by the workman (as in the general case of manufactures), the contract partakes of sale. It is the executory sale of the English law (a).

(a) See above, § 90. Pothier, Louage, No. 394. Story on Bailments, 277.

148. Obligations of Workman.—His obligations are to do the work or labour stipulated or implied, and within the time appointed. There is an implied warranty that these duties shall be well performed, otherwise the hire shall not be due, nor damages demandable.

149. Such contracts are frequently made on a specification and estimate, from which in the course of the work there may arise a deviation. In such cases two sets of questions may be raised. Thus, if more be done than is bargained for, the employer is not bound to take it, unless the excess be slight or unavoidable (a), 'or it consist of extra work ordered or assented to by him in the knowledge that it involves extra expense (b)'; or, if it must necessarily be taken as incorporated with his own materials, he will not be liable for a greater hire of labour than he at first engaged to pay. But if he have acquiesced in the deviation, the quantum meruit, ascertained by measure or value, will be the rule, as in contracts for the building or repairing of houses (c). If the work have been imperfectly or unskilfully done, 'or not according to contract,' the employer is not bound to take it, and is entitled to damages unless he shall have acquiesced (d). If the work be united with his materials, 'it was said in the earlier editions of this book that' it seems not yet to be settled whether the employer shall have right to the subject without paying, or the workman shall be bound to indemnify (e). 'In such a case, however, the liability of the employer depends on the utility or inutility of the work. He is bound to pay so far only as he is benefited. But if there is a special contract to complete a certain piece of work, the mere fact that part performance or imperfect performance has been beneficial does not in England render the owner liable to pay the quantum meruit (f). Where the workman fails to finish work upon the employer's premises, and the employer proceeds to finish it by other workmen or contractors, the employer has a right, at least under the usual clause in contracts for building, etc., to retain the materials and tools brought upon the premises for that purpose, subject to the workman's claim for the value of the materials, and a reasonable hire for the use of the tools (g). The employer may retain the contract price in respect of a claim of damages for non-implement of such a mutual contract (h); and if damages for delay be fixed at a certain sum for the period during which the work is unfinished, that will be held as pactional damages, and not a penalty subject to modification (i), unless the sum stipulated be exorbitant and unconscionable, when it will not be allowed to the full amount (k). Claims of damages for imperfect work, or of repayment of sums paid for work not done, discovered after the completion of a building or other executory contract, will be barred by a final settlement proceeding on the reports of inspectors appointed by the employer (l).

(d) In England the employer seems to be held at law entitled to take what has been done amiss, without paying for it. This probably arises from the rules of English pleading. Correct this statement of Prof. Bell by Addison on Contr. 395-96, 406.

150. The degree of care requisite on the part of the workman is that implied in ordinary diligence (a).

(a) See below, § 232.

151. Obligations of Employer.—His obligation is to pay the hire at the time, and in the way, stipulated or implied. If the employment be general to labour, or on time, the hire is due as the work is done and added to the employer's materials. If the work be unskillfully performed, and such as the employer would not have been bound to receive if completed, the hire will not be due (a). 'But, unless the terms of the contract strictly exclude any other meaning (b), the exact performance of all the particular details of a stipulated work is not a condition precedent of the right to some remuneration. In a building contract, for example, the builder is entitled to recover the price, subject to deduction of such a sum as will make defective work correspond with the specification, and of such loss as the employer may have suffered by non-performance (c). In a contract for work to be done according to plans and specifications, there is no implied warranty by the employer that the work can be done in the very way described. Extra work contemplated by the contract is to be paid at the rates provided in the contract; but if additional or varied work, so different as not to be within the contract at all, becomes necessary, it appears that the contractor may refuse to go on with the contract, or go on and claim quantum meruit; but in the latter case, he ought perhaps to give notice of the footing on which he is to proceed (d).'

(c) See, e.g., Macbride v. Hamilton & Son, 1875; 2 R. 775. Gibson & Stewart v. Brown & Co., 1876; 3 R. 328, and cases in § 149 (g), (h), (k). With us such questions are determined according to the principle of mutuality in contracts (§ 71), and we are not troubled with various questions of pleading which occur in the English books. These, however, afford assistance in the construction of contracts upon this subject. See 2 Smith's L. C., notes to Cutter v. Powell. Addison on Contr. 391, 396, etc.

(d) Thorn v. Lord Mayor of London, L. R. 1 App. Ca. 120; 45 L. J. Ex. 487.

152. Risk.—In proper locatio operis, where the subject on which the work is to be bestowed belongs to the employer, the risk is with the employer—res perit domino. The hire is not forfeited, or repayment demandable, if the thing should, without fault of the workman, perish with the work on it (a). Such is the case of repairs to a ship which is burnt before being finished (b); 'or of building work performed on the ground of the employer (c).' As to printer's work burnt in the printing-office, usage has been held to alter the general rule (d). But if the workman be hired to accomplish some particular operation which he undertakes to do 'for a specific sum,' and the whole perishes before he has completed his undertaking, 'i.e. in the phraseology of the English law, if the contract be entire,' the loss of his work would seem to fall on him (e); yet in those cases of executory contracts where the price is paid periodically, and the subject appropriated to the employer at the several payments, the whole would perish to the employer. If the workman is to make an article of manufacture of materials to be found by himself, the risk is with the workman, and the unfinished work perishes to him. It is an incomplete executory sale, and he cannot claim the price of his labour.

III. HIRING OF SKILLED LABOUR.

153. Nature of the Contract.—The engagement here is to bestow attention, art, and skill on the act to be performed; skill being presumed in all professional persons, according to the rule, "Spondet peritiam artis, et imperitia culpæ annumeratur." The selection for superior skill is with the employer (a); but he is entitled to rely on ordinary skill (b). The rate of hire is settled by the contract, or by the ordinary wages of such labour, or by the usage of the parties, or by quantum meruit (c). The time is regulated in the same way, by agreement or by usage, as in the hiring of clerks and managers (d).

(a) As to his wilful selection of unqualified persons, see Addison on Contr. 414.

154. The Rules of Responsibility derived from the above principle are:

(1.) That one not a professor of the art is liable only for the best exertion of his skill, such as it may be (a).

(2.) That, by a professional man, a specific act is to be done according to rule, if a rule be fixed (b). When the rule is obscure, professional usage may excuse error (c).

(3.) Where express directions are given to such a person, slight deviations, within the fair limits of professional discretion, are justifiable (d).

(4.) That if the object be safely attainable by a known method, the professional man takes the risk of deviation from that method. In general, the criterion is reasonable care and skill (e).

(5.) That if the act be difficult or complicated, want of success is not an absolute test of responsibility. 'But the onus of showing that injury to goods, sustained in undergoing a delicate process of manufacture, was not the fault of the workman to whom they were entrusted for that purpose, lies on the workman (f).'

(6.) The responsibility is only for actual damage: as in killing a lame horse; blundering an objectionable adjudication (g). 'It is a good answer to a claim of damages that the pursuer could not have received the expected benefit even if the person employed had performed his duty, in other words, that no damage has resulted from the act or default; though the relevancy of such a defence in the special case of one entrusted with a statutory duty, such as the recording of a writ, was doubted (h). The general rule is, that an agent is bound to reinstate his employer in the position in which he would have been if he had duly performed his duty; and so, if the error can be corrected, a law agent may be allowed so to discharge his liability, as by paying off prior encumbrances on property he has been employed to purchase, or even over which he has lent his client's money (i). But if by his culpable non-disclosure of material facts, or negligence in making necessary investigations, his employer has been led into a losing transaction, which a reasonable man, knowing the facts, would not have agreed to, an agent may be required to relieve the employer of the contract, e.g. by repaying a sum lent out on a bad security, and receiving an assignation to the debt and security (k).'

(7.) It is no defence to a messenger-at-arms, that he has not injured or betrayed the interest of his employers; or to an agent bungling an act in which adverse parties are concerned (as a loan), that he was employed by one of them (as by the granter of the bond): he acts for both parties; and the person injured, or who is to receive the security, is he for whose behoof the law will interfere, and by whom the order is held to be given (l). 'But while this rule holds good where the terms of the employment, or professional usage, make it a law agent's duty to attend to the interests of both parties to a transaction, one who professes any art is, in general, liable for want of skill or negligence only to his employer, and not to those who may have been intended to benefit by his work, but with whom he has not contracted (m). But clear irregularity in using diligence makes a law agent as well as his employer liable for the injury done to the person against whom it is put in force (n).'

(8.) When the hiring is on time, with a salary, incapacity or negligence of the person employed will free the employer, but not if acquiesced in without complaint (o), 'or known and explained to the employer at the time of engagement (p).'

IV. HIRING OF CARE AND CUSTODY.

155. Description of this Contract.—This is the contract which regulates the duties of depositaries for hire, wharfingers, warehousemen, livery stablers, and persons who keep depasturing fields for cattle. The engagement is for safe keeping: And this implies a secure place of custody (a); a warehouse water-tight, secure from attacks without and fire within, and free from vermin (b), or whatever is injurious to that kind of commodity;—a grazing field guarded against the escape of cattle, 'the intrusion of savage and dangerous beasts,' and free from pitfalls and dangers (c). It implies the personal care of the lessor and his servants, to prevent injuries incident to property in that situation (d). 'The onus is said to be on the warehouseman or depositary to show that injury did not occur through his fault, but it necessarily varies in different contracts and circumstances (e).' By express contract, or even by notice (f), these liabilities are alterable in extent of responsibility (g). 'Where, as in the case of luggage deposited in a cloak-room or carried in a steamship, the ticket given to the passenger or depositor is relied on as giving notice of the terms of the bailment, it must be shown that the conditions were either known to him or that he had reasonable notice of their existence. The rule may be thus expressed: where one of two contracting parties delivers to the other a document (ticket or voucher) in a common form, stating the terms on which he enters into the proposed contract (his "offer"), and the other accepts and acts upon it without objection, the latter, if his attention has been sufficiently drawn to the fact that there are conditions, is held, on the principle of personal bar, to accept the offer as it is made, and is bound by the terms of the document, whether he reads it or not (h). He is not so bound if the transaction is such that the receiver of the ticket may suppose that it contains no conditions (i), or where it is misleading (k), or fraudulent, or perhaps where the conditions are unreasonable or absurd (l).'

156. Responsibility.—The commencement of a warehouseman's and of a wharfinger's responsibility is different. The warehouseman, or the wharfinger when employed as such, is a mere custodier, and his responsibility begins with the arrival of the goods at the warehouse, and the act of custody, as by applying the crane of the warehouse (a). But a wharfinger has the duty of attending to the landing and receiving of the goods; and his responsibility will commence as soon as the goods are landed on the wharf, or put out of the hands of the carrier or porter for embarkation (b).

V. HIRING OF CARRIAGE.

157. Objects of this Contract.—The carrying trade, now so important a branch of commercial intercourse, is either inland, by land or water; or sea-carriage. The former, together with the general principles of the contract, may here be considered (a).

(a) The peculiarities of sea-carriage will be discussed below, § 405 et seq.

158. The contract of carriage may be viewed, 1. as relative to goods; 2. as relative to persons.

159. Carriage of Goods.—This contract, which is the locatio operis mercium vehundarum, is for safe carriage of commodities, and delivery of them in good condition, in consideration of a hire, stipulated or implied.

The contract of carriage may be Express, depending on the terms of the agreement; or Implied, from the status of a common carrier, with goods fixed on him by receipt, or parole proof, and which by his office he is as much bound to carry as if there were a special contract. He is bound to take the goods offered, and can justifiably refuse them only if dangerous from their nature, or from popular tumult; or if he does not profess to carry such goods (a); or has no convenient means of doing so; or if not brought in due time for packing (b).

(a) A common carrier is bound only to take such goods as he publicly professes to carry (Johnson v. Midl. Ry. Co., 18 L. J. Ex. 366; 4 Ex. 397. M'Andrew v. Electr. Tel. Co., 17 C. B. 3; 25 L. J. C. P. 26); and is at liberty to refuse them (e.g. dogs and live stock) except under special contract regulating the terms and conditions of carriage. M'Manus v. L. and Y. Ry. Co., 4 H. & N. 327; 28 L. J. Ex. 353. Oxlade v. N.-E. Ry. Co., 15 C. B. N. S. 680. Harrison v. L. and B. Ry. Co., 2 B. & S. 122; 29 L. J. Q. B. 218; 31 ib. 113. Austin v. M. S. and L. Ry. Co., 16 Q. B. 600; 20 L. J. Q. B. 440. Wood v. Burns, 1893; 20 R. 602 (pianos carried "only at owners' risk"). But the contract must be conformable to the Act 17 and 18 Vict. c. 31, in the case of railway and canal companies. See § 244A.

(b) Edwards v. Sherratt, 1 East, 604. Batson v. Donovan, 4 B. & Ald. 32; 1 Ill. 139; 22 R. R. 599. Carr v. L. and Y. Ry. Co., 7 Ex. 707. Tattan v. G. W. Ry. Co., 27 L. J. Q. B. 184. Aldridge v. G. W. Ry. Co., 15 C. B. N. S. 582. Addison on Contr. 525 sq. Infra, § 244A. By statute no carrier or warehouse owner is bound to carry or receive any goods which are specially dangerous; and nitro-glycerine, and goods so declared in any order of the Privy Council, are "specially dangerous." See Farrant v. Barnes, 11 C. B. N. S. 553; 31 L. J. C. P. 137 (damages due to carrier at common law). Hearne v. Garton, 28 L. J. Q. B. 306 (knowledge of consignor necessary to conviction). 38 Vict. c. 17 (Explosives Act), especially § 34, 35, 37, 43, 88. And as to ships, see 57 and 58 Vict. c. 60, § 301, 445 sqq. See also 8 and 9 Vict. c. 33, § 98 (railway); 33 and 34 Vict. c. 78, § 53 (tramway).

160. Responsibility of the Carrier.—The essential peculiarity in the contract with a common carrier is, that holding himself out in a public character, he is under certain fixed responsibilities. A common carrier is one who, for hire, undertakes the carriage of goods, 'generally, or of certain classes of goods,' for any of the public indiscriminately, from and to a certain place (a). 'One of the termini may be beyond the seas (b); and in the case of shipowners and carriers by sea, it has been held in England that they are liable as common carriers, though trading without any fixed terminus, and letting the vessel only to one person for each voyage (c).'

(a) See Riley v. Horne, 5 Bing. 224; 30 R. R. 576. Dickson v. G. N. Ry. Co., 18 Q. B. D. 176.

(b) Crouch v. L. and N.-W. Ry. Co., 14 C. B. 255; 23 L. J. C. P. 73.

160A. 'Railway Companies are not common carriers of passengers, and so not liable as insurers (a). But they are common carriers of goods, subject to any special limitation or exemption by their Act of Parliament, profession, practice, or special stipulation which they may lawfully make (b). Under the equality clauses in their special Acts and the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act, railway companies are bound to charge equally to all persons for the carriage, on the same journey and under the same circumstances, of all goods (c); and money paid in excess in contravention of such clauses may be recovered back (d). But while they are not common carriers of goods which they do not profess to carry, railway and canal companies are required by the Railway and Canal Traffic Act to make proper arrangements, and afford all reasonable facilities, for the receiving, forwarding, and delivering of traffic (which includes passengers and their luggage, goods, animals, etc.), without unreasonable delay, and without giving any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person or company, or any particular kind of traffic, or subjecting any persons or kind of traffic to undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage; and so that no obstruction may be offered to the public desiring to use their railways and canals as a continuous line of communication (e).

'The Acts of 1873 (Regulation of Railways Act (f)) and the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888 (g)) followed upon this statute, and have amended it, and established a special tribunal—the Railway and Canal Commission—for administering the law under it and under enactments in special Acts relating to traffic facilities, undue preferences, or other matters mentioned in § 2 of the Act of 1854. This Commission has now power to hear and determine disputes as to the legality, and to enforce payment, of tolls, rates, or charges which have been brought into dispute (h); and also, in addition to or substitution for other relief, to award damages (i). These Acts make the jurisdiction of the Railway and Canal Commissioners exclusive, an appeal on points of law being allowable (k).

'The provisions of these Acts do not extend to facilities for storing goods after delivery to consignees, as by letting surplus land as a coal depôt (l), nor to rates charged by a railway company for the use of docks not connected with their railway business (m). But they apply to undue and unreasonable disadvantage imposed upon a particular kind of traffic, e.g. by charging in excess of the authorised rates to such an extent as to impede or prevent traffic, although there be no preference of a particular person or class (n).'

161. To raise the liability, the carrier must be legitimately charged with the goods.

162. A common carrier by land is so charged, by delivery of the goods to him, or to some one empowered to act for him (a). But it is not sufficient to lay them down in a common yard of an inn, where other carriers' goods are (b); nor to deliver them to the carriers' servants on the road, between the two points of his journey (c), unless the servants be sent round or commissioned to receive goods (d); nor to deliver a letter to the postman on the street (e); nor to deliver them in a state insecure and unfit for carriage (f): yet if the defect of security be manifest, and the carrier undertake the carriage notwithstanding, it is enough (g).

163. The obligations incumbent on a carrier are either, 1. under his contract; or 2. under certain rules of public policy.

164. (1.) Under his Contract.—These are, that the vehicle shall be sufficient for safely carrying the goods; that they shall be properly packed and placed in the vehicle, 'unless the consignor has undertaken this responsibility himself (a)'; that ordinary care, and the regular course of the journey, shall be observed in the transit (b); and that the goods shall be delivered according to the undertaking. In all these points the presumption is against the carrier where any damage is sustained; and the onus probandi is laid on him (c). 'The consignee is not barred from recovering damages by breaking bulk (d).'

In a contract to furnish or carry by a ship or other vehicle at a set time, the measure of damage will be the increased freight payable for another means of conveyance (*Connal, Cotton, & Co. v. (d) But his doing so without notice is an element to be considered in weighing the evidence. Johnston & Sons v. Dove, 1875; 3 R. 202; and by delay after receipt in giving notice of damage he will be barred from objecting to the condition of the goods. Stewart v. N. B. Ry. Co., 1878; 5 R. 426.

165. The vehicle in land-carriage, whether cart, waggon, wain, van, or other carriage or coach used in transporting goods, must not only in itself, but in all accessories, as tackle, horses, drivers, etc., be sufficient (a): as in water-carriage, the ship, boat, barge, etc., must be seaworthy; not merely in itself, hull and rigging, tight, staunch, and strong for the voyage, but also properly manned and navigated; with the necessary stores and documents for safety (b).

The carriage must be performed with the care and skill necessary for safety; on land, by having careful and skilful drivers, and by due observance of the rules of carriage; at sea, by sailing according to the rules of good seamanship (a). The presumption is against the carrier, where no extraordinary accident has caused the damage (b). Care must be taken in the transit to prevent injury from concussion or explosion (c); to cover and protect the goods from the weather (d); and due vigilance must be exercised to prevent depredation (e). 'But while carriers are bound to take all reasonable precautions for the security of goods carried, which do not involve any unusual expenditure, and the providing of which does not require unusual sagacity or foresight, they are not responsible under the contract, and where the edict is excluded by special agreement (see § 235, 244A), for

168. The thing carried must be delivered according to the undertaking (a); either to the person indicated by the contract, or according to the address, the carrier being liable for porters (b); or to one properly authorised to receive them (c); or to another carrier, in order to complete the transit, if on that line of road the latter part of the journey is performed by another (d); or to the consignor stopping the goods in transitu. 'If there be no special direction as to delivery, a carrier is discharged by delivery to a named consignee who demands goods at another place than that to which they are addressed (e). In some earlier cases the undertaking of a carrier receiving goods addressed to a place beyond the terminus of his ordinary journey or line of railway was held to be only to deliver to the carrier occupying the next part of the route; but in the absence of special conditions (f), a carrier receiving goods to be conveyed to a place beyond his terminus is now held responsible for their safe carriage during the whole of their transit, though during part of the way they should be conveyed by another carrier, the latter being regarded as his agent (g). Such also is the liability under the contracts of those who collect goods for transmission by ship or rail to different parts of the world under the name of express companies, forwarding contractors, or general carriers (h). The liability of the carrier extends to the safe custody and redelivery of the goods to the sender's order, when they are rejected by the consignee, or cannot for other reasons be delivered to him (i).'

A carrier may retain the goods for the price of their carriage, but not for a general balance or the hire of former carriages (k).

The carrier will be discharged of his obligation to deliver under the contract, if the goods have perished by inevitable accident (l); by internal defect, or some peculiar peril of the article carried (m), 'such as the "inherent vice" of animals causing them injury by their own acts, and without negligence of the carrier (n)'; or even by the carrier's own act, if compelled by manifest necessity, as jettison in crossing a ferry, to save life (o).

169. (2.) Responsibilities under Public Policy.

—These are different in principle and effect from those under the contract. As shipmasters, innkeepers, and stablers have facilities for associating themselves or their servants with robbers, thieves, and pilferers of all descriptions, it has been deemed expedient to admit against them a legal presumption of negligence or collusion, and to allow of no excuse or justification for loss or injury to the goods entrusted to their care, without proof of inevitable accident. But as this is a part of the great doctrine of care or diligence prestatable, it is better to take the whole in one view (a).

170. Carriage of Persons.—This contract differs from the contract for the carriage of goods, in so far as the protection of human life has required a stricter rule both of sufficiency and of vigilance. (1.) Passengers and Luggage.—Carriers of this description are not at liberty to refuse a passenger, if room be left unengaged (a); if a place be engaged, it must be made good to the passenger; and the coachman is bound to receive and take charge of the usual luggage allowed to a passenger (b).

Through Contracts.—As in the case of goods (§ 168), a railway company is liable to a passenger taking from it a through ticket, even for accidents occurring in the course of the journey on the line of another railway company (c). The contract of the company issuing the through ticket is, that the passenger shall be carried to his destination with due and reasonable care; and the company is liable for the negligence of all parties whose care is directly necessary for the passenger's safe conveyance (d); and for the sufficiency and safety of all parts of the road of transit (e). The same rule applies to the carriage of the passenger's luggage under a through ticket (f). It is not liable for an accident occurring to its passenger through the negligence, not of its own servants, but of those of another company using the line, but not under its control, or concerned with his conveyance (g). It has also been laid down, and appears to be sound, that apart from contract, the fact that a person is a passenger casts a duty on the railway company or other carrier to carry him safely (h). So an action lies against a railway company upon whose line an accident occurs, though it has not issued the ticket to the passenger, or directly contracted with him, either upon the ground that the company issuing the ticket was its agent, or (it would appear) upon the ground of quasi-delict (tort), or at least that by receiving the passenger and taking benefit by carrying him, it assumes a duty towards him (i).

(2.) Vehicle, etc.—The coach must be strong and fit for the journey; road-worthy, as far as human foresight can provide (k), with steady horses and suitable harness (l). There must be provided drivers of competent skill and steadiness; and for any failure in that respect the coachmaster is liable (m).

'Passengers are entitled to be conveyed with reasonable speed (n). A railway company issuing tickets (o) to passengers is liable for any personal inconvenience caused by its negligent delay in breach of the conditions of the contract contained in the ticket, timetables, or other documents referred to on the ticket; but not for such consequences as could not naturally be contemplated as the result of such breach, e.g. catching cold by walking home late at night, or pecuniary loss by missing an appointment (p). And a passenger is entitled to recover such expense caused by delay as would be incurred in the circumstances by a reasonable man who had no recourse against a railway company (q).'

(3.) Care.—The degree of care that is requisite exceeds in vigilance that of the ordinary contract of carriage. The safeguard to which, by the policy of the law, the lives and limbs of passengers are entrusted, is extreme vigilance and caution; enforced by penal statutes (r), and by a very strict civil responsibility. So, if the coachman is guilty of furious driving; if he allow an extra number of passengers; if he carry the reins so loose as not to keep the command of his team on any sudden interruption or alarm; if he do not give due notice to outside passengers in passing any obstacle, as under a gateway, 'or in the case of railway companies, of any block or unusual risk on the line (s)'; if he permit collision with another carriage, by not observing the rules of the road,—the coach proprietors are liable for the damage thence arising (t).

'The passenger injured in a collision is not prevented from recovering damages from the culpable owner of the other ship or train or car, by reason of the contributory fault of the master or driver of the ship or vehicle in which he was travelling (u).

'Although in such cases the carrier's liability rests primarily on contract, a claim similar to assythment accrues to a passenger's heirs, wife, children, or parents on his death by the carrier's fault. Indeed, it is now settled in England, after much discussion, that a railway is liable for damage done by its servants to passengers or goods lawfully on their premises or in their carriages, provided it be done by misfeasance, i.e. by active wrongdoing, and not merely by non-feasance or omission (v). It does not appear that this distinction has been recognised in our law. The carrier of passengers does not, like the carrier of goods (infra, § 235 sq.), warrant or insure their safe conveyance. He is bound to take "due care," i.e. a very high degree of care, and he contracts that his carriages, bridges, and other means of conveyance are reasonably fit for the purposes to which they are to be applied (w). But that does not imply responsibility for the consequences of a latent defect in his carriage which no skill, care, or foresight could have prevented or detected (x).

'The onus of proving sufficiency and due care is said to lie on the carrier, and the breaking down of a coach or train is prima facie evidence of negligence (y).

'A carrier is not bound to carry merchandise as luggage (z). But he may be liable for the loss of what is obviously merchandise, and is taken as luggage without objection (aa).

'Railway companies are also bound to keep their stations and the accesses to them in a safe condition, and to give passengers reasonable facilities for getting into their trains and alighting from them in safety; but this, of course, does not dispense with ordinary care on the part of the passengers (bb).'

(4.) The Rules of the Road which are thus to be observed are, in meeting a carriage or horse, etc., to keep to the left hand; in passing, to keep to the right, the foremost bearing to the left; in crossing, to bear to the left, and pass behind the other carriage (cc). But these rules will not hold invariably in crowded streets, or where the street or road is broad, and there is no fault chargeable on the coachman (dd). 'Where there are tramway-cars, passing carriages take the left of car passed (ee).'

VI. HIRING OF SERVICES.

171. Different Kinds.—The hiring of services includes, 1. the hiring of domestic servants; and 2. the hiring of workmen in a manufactory (a).

(a) 3 Ersk. Pr. 3. § 5. 3 Ersk. 3. § 14, 18. See above as to Hiring of Ordinary Labour, § 146; and of Clerks, § 153.

172. Hiring of Domestic Servants.—This is a contract for the hire of services to be performed in the domestic economy of a house, garden, or farm, or in personal attendance.

173. (1.) Proof of Contract.—The contract may be either verbal or in writing (a).

If the engagement be for a year, or during the term which, by general or local usage, is fixed as the ordinary duration of the particular service, the contract may be proved by parole evidence or oath of party; and if unconditional, will effectually bind the parties (b). Commonly "earnest" is given as the test of engagement; but is not indispensable, unless where established by custom, when there is locus pœnitentiæ till it has been given. When given, the return of the earnest will not dissolve the engagement (c).

For a longer term a probative writing is required, till which there is locus pœnitentiæ 'at least' as to the excess beyond the usual term, in absence of rei interventus; and oath of party will not supply the want of it (d).

(2.) Tacit Relocation.—From term to term the engagement is held to be renewed in all its parts by tacit relocation, without writing, where due interruption or warning is not given by either of the parties that the engagement is to terminate (e).

174. Duration.—The term of duration is different in different employments and places; and it is held that rural servants, 'including grieves and overseers (a), gamekeepers (b), and in some cases gardeners (c),' are engaged for a year (during the revolution of the seasons), work or no work (d). Generally speaking, domestic servants, in town or country, are engaged for six months (e); and it is no alteration of this, although the engagement bear to be at the rate of so much a year (f). It has been said that in one case a governess was held to be engaged for a year (g); but this is not now held to be law, 'and the tendency of modern decisions, especially in regard to superior servants in whom trust is reposed, is to hold the engagement (in the absence of express contract) to be during mutual pleasure, and determinable by reasonable notice on either side (h).' The engagement may be prolonged to any term, 'even for life, if the terms be not unreasonable or illegal (i).' Sometimes the engagement is indefinite; to be closed on the one part by a month's warning, 'or by such warning as is reasonable or usual,' on the other by payment or forfeiture of a month's wages, 'or reasonable compensation (k).' The engagement usually terminates only by warning (l).

175. Service.—The essentials of the contract are,—service on the one hand; hire or wages on the other.

176. The service is regulated either by special contract or engagement; as the service of a butler, of a valet, of a groom, of a gardener, etc.; or by custom, general or local.

The rule as to service is, that the master is entitled to require the servant to perform all that fairly belongs to the line of service for which he is engaged; that slight deviations from such line of engagement will not be held to justify a servant's disobedience of his master's orders: But that, if such deviations, though slight, be often repeated, or if what is required be a manifest departure from the line of the servant's engagement, he will not be bound to obey; as when a servant is turned from rural to domestic service, or vice versa (a).

177. The price of the labour to be performed by a domestic servant is given in the hire or wages, accompanied in the ordinary case by board and lodging. Strictly speaking, a sum allowed for board and lodging is not wages, though generally called board-wages (a).

'Implied Agreement to Pay Wages.—When wages are not stipulated, an obligation to pay them may be implied. In the ordinary case there is a presumption from the continuous residence and service that wages are due, but this presumption is readily rebutted by circumstances indicating that the services were rendered gratuitously from good feeling or self-interest, or in return for board and lodging (b). There is less room for the presumption in some cases where service is given by near relatives; but if the servant at the commencement of the service is very young, the presumption that wages are payable after his services have become valuable is stronger (c). It is much more difficult to establish an implied contract for extra remuneration (d).'

178. The servant's express obligation is, to serve in the capacity, at the place, and for the time for which he engages, or to pay damages (a). A collateral and implied obligation is, to be faithful, honest, and observant of all the decencies of domestic life: to avoid insolence in his intercourse with his master and his family; to keep his master's hours; and not absent himself without leave (b).

179. The stipulated time of service may be abridged (a) by the death of the servant; in which case his representatives will be entitled to rateable wages for the time during which the service continued (b); or 'it is said by Professor Bell in previous editions' by inability from hurts received in his master's service (c), which will excuse the servant's non-performance, without forfeiting his wages. 'But this distinction has not been approved (d). The true principle is, that contracts for personal services are subject to the implied condition that the parties contracting shall be alive to receive or perform them, and not incapacitated by any illness of which they were not cognisant at the time of contracting (e). When, therefore, it becomes impossible to perform the contract, as by the lengthened illness or the death of the servant, the death of the master, the dissolution by death (but not by bankruptcy or agreement) of a firm of employers, or (probably) by the insanity of the master or his illness compelling him to retire from the business for which the servant is engaged, the contract is determined (e).¹ Sickness or inevitable accident, though not incurred in his master's service, will excuse non-performance for a short time; but if the inability should continue long, and a substitute should be required, the master will be discharged from his counter-obligation to pay wages (f).

See below, § 570. On the servant's death or inability, wages are due for the period actually served; see Fraser, M. & S. 138; and above (b). As to wages on the master's death, etc., see below, § 185-6.

(f) Manson v. Downie, cit. (e).

180. Although there should be no stipulation as to change of place, a domestic or personal servant may be removed from town to country, or from country to town, and required to accompany the master's family or person; but not to leave Scotland: nor to go to a distant part of the country without an engagement for his return, and indemnification for time and expense (a). A servant engaged for local employment cannot be compelled to go to a distant part of the country (b).

(a) See Baird v. Don, 1779; 5 B. Sup. 514; M. 9182; Hailes, 839; 1 Ill. 147. See Fraser, M. & S. 82 sq.

(b) Tait, J. of P. 348.

181. Enlisting in the King's service 'was formerly,' by the Mutiny Act, admitted not only to exempt the servant from damages for breach of contract, but to entitle him to wages during the time of his actual service.

But this exception 'was' merely statutory, and against the rule of the common law (a). 'This was altered in later Mutiny Acts, and now, by the Army Act, 1881, while a soldier has certain privileges in regard to civil procedure, there is nothing to prevent him from being adjudged liable in damages for breach of contract, or at least to forfeiture of wages already earned (b).'

No other voluntary engagement will excuse the servant. So marriage during the currency of the engagement is no legitimate excuse for not fulfilling the obligation; and although a husband will be entitled to have the society of his wife, and to require her to leave her service, he will be liable in damages for her breach of contract (c). Imprisonment for debt will not excuse a servant's absence; the wages will be forfeited, and damages due (d).

182. Dismissal.—The master must receive a domestic servant, and give bed and board during the time agreed on. And so he is not entitled prematurely to dismiss the servant, paying wages; but will be liable besides for board-wages and for damages. The servant cannot lawfully be dismissed for a slight fault, but only for a serious breach of engagement, or for insolence (a). 'A master may justify dismissal by causes not assigned by him at the time, and even by causes not known to him till afterwards (b). Damages for wrongful dismissal are to be assessed, as by a jury, with reference to the loss actually suffered; and although some account may be taken of the fault on the one side or the other, the fact that wages have, or might easily have, been earned in other employment of a similar kind, which a reasonable man would have accepted, between the date of dismissal and the natural termination of the engagement, is admitted in modern practice to modify the damages (c).'

183. The master has been held entitled to dismiss a servant on paying wages and board-wages (a): But he is not entitled capriciously, and without cause shown, to compel the servant to reside out of the family while the service continues; the engagement (especially of a female) being on the faith of the protection of the master's house (b).

184. Wages.—The master must pay the wages stipulated or usual. This payment is (according to the usage) either half-yearly or yearly, the servant's claim prescribing in three years (a).

(a) 3 Ersk. 3. § 14. Cooper, supra, § 183 (a). See below, § 629; and above, § 153. Scott v. E. Mansfield, 1831; 9 S. 780; aff. 1833, 6 W. & S. 277.

185. If the master should become unable to perform his engagement, the servant has still right to his wages as a creditor, under deduction of what he earns elsewhere during the time engaged for (a).

(a) Puncheon v. Haig, 1790; M. 13,990; 1 Ill. 149. See above, § 179, 182.

186. On the master's death, wages to the next term are due, provided the servant is ready to perform his part; and not only proper wages are due, but board-wages (a) also, if the establishment of the deceased be broken up. Upon the master's executry the servant has a preference, by privilege, for the term's wages; but not for board, which is not wages (b).

On the master's bankruptcy or insolvency, the servant has a preferable claim over the other creditors to the same extent as against the executry on death (b).

(a) See above, § 177.

(b) See below, § 1404.

187. Termination of Service.—(1.) Warning.—There must be warning on either part to put an end to the engagement (a), 'unless it be dispensed with by the contract (expressly, or by implication from the temporary character of the employment), or by usage (b).' This must, 'in yearly or half-yearly engagements,' be forty days before the term, 'or termination of the engagement,' unless by agreement or local usage a shorter time is sufficient (c). The proof of warning may raise questions. It is not necessary that the warning shall be judicial, as in the warning of tenants; and, 'while it is enough that either party distinctly shows by his conduct that he does not intend to renew the engagement,' it is not warning that the master has been inquiring after another servant, or the servant after another place (d). 'Reasonable notice only, not formal warning forty days before the term, is required in the case of clerks, tutors, and others, not domestic servants (e).'

The dismissal of public school teachers is now regulated by 45 and 46 Vict. c. 18. See Hinds v. Dunbar School Board, 1883; 10 R. 930.

188. (2.) Character.—It has been sometimes held that the master must, at the termination of the contract, give to the servant a character; but this is only a moral, not a legal obligation, and cannot be enforced. Although not bound to comply with the servant's demand for a character, he may give one, even unfavourable to the servant, and in so doing is privileged to speak. But if a bad character be given, and not truly, the master will be liable to the servant in damages (a). 'So an employer may be made liable in damages for knowingly or recklessly and without belief (b) giving a false character in favour of a servant, by relying on which a third party suffers loss (c).'

189. Managers, etc.—The engagement of a manager, cashier, or other servant in a bank, must depend entirely on the contract; but the importance of having the absolute command over such persons and in such establishments, where many objections may occur which cannot be brought to any known or recognised breach of duty, is held to give a bias in the construction of such contracts favourable to the uncontrolled power of dismissal without reason assigned (a).

190. Hiring of Artisans.—The hiring of artisans is a contract on time, or by piecework, for labour to be performed in a manufactory along with other workmen. The contract on time is, like that of domestic service, verbal for a year or a shorter term, but requires writing for a longer period (a). 'As tacit relocation is founded on custom, it has no place where warning is excluded by usage or contract, and operates to renew the engagement only for such a period as is usual, not therefore, in an engagement of artisans for a year, for another year (b).'

(b) Lennox v. Allan & Son, 1880; 8 R. 38; supra, § 173 (2).

191. (1.) The Obligation of the Artisan is, to perform his stipulated work with due subordination and regularity, and observance of the rules of the establishment, during the term agreed on. The Legislature interposed to compel fulfilment of workmen's engagements, by empowering one or more justices of the peace, in certain descriptions of manufacture, on complaint upon oath, to apprehend, inquire, and, if necessary, imprison the workman not beyond three months to hard labour; or to abate his wages, if he 'should' refuse to enter to his work, or if he 'should' desert his service before expiration of the term, or if he 'should' be guilty of any misconduct or misdemeanour respecting the service (a). 'A later statute on this subject, the Master and Servant Act, 1867 (b), modified the severity of these Acts, took away the power of summary apprehension, and while retaining the compulsor of imprisonment as a penalty for failure to pay a fine or damages, really substituted a civil suit for a criminal complaint. In 1875, however, this Act also was repealed (c), and the Employers and Workmen Act passed in its place (d). This Act makes the Sheriff a sort of arbiter between masters and workmen, with very wide discretionary powers to adjust disputes, rescind contracts, apportion wages, award damages, require security for performance, etc.; but with no power to enforce any orders (except against apprentices, who may be imprisoned) unless by the ordinary means of enforcing decrees of damages in the Small Debt Court, namely, by poinding or arrestment (e).'

192. (2.) The Obligation of the Master is to pay the wages stipulated or implied (a); and in this he is placed, 'in many trades,' under certain restraints as to the mode of payment—not by truck, but by money (b).

'Wages in the enumerated trades must be paid in the current coin of the realm only; and contracts as to the place where and the manner in which, or the persons with whom wages shall be expended, are illegal, null, and void (c). Payment in goods is illegal, null, and void, and wages not paid in current coin may still be recovered at law. The master is not entitled to plead against a claim for wages compensation in respect of furnishings from his store, or goods supplied by any person under his order or direction, or by any agent; and such an employer, person, or agent cannot sue the workmen for or in respect of goods so supplied (d). Payment may be by bank-notes or drafts, if the artificer consents; but payments by orders or cheques to be cashed in part at the master's store (e), or in orders for goods at a store, even if the employer be not interested in the store (f), are illegal evasions of the Act. Penalties may be recovered for illegal payments and contracts (g). Certain deductions from wages for medical attendance, medicine, rent, materials, etc., are permitted (h). And a payment to discharge an obligation of the employee at his desire is to be a payment in cash to the employee (i).

'In the hosiery manufacture the Truck Act has been supplemented by a special Act prohibiting deductions (previously permitted) from wages for frame rents or other charges (k). Deductions for sharpening tools, and contracts for spending wages at particular shops are prohibited, and the Acts are applied to knitted and other articles made by artificers at their own homes (l).'

The master is bound also to give to the workman a full supply of work (if his wages depend on the price) during the term agreed on (m). And (as the counterpart of the restraints on the workman) the Legislature 'gave' them certain facilities for recovering payment of wages (n), 'now repealed; but the workman as well as the employer may avail himself of the procedure for settling disputes or claims under the Employers and Workmen Act.'

193. Combination Laws. — Masters and workmen have reciprocally great power over each other by means of combination. Formerly the combinations of the masters were the more powerful and oppressive, from their unity of counsels, their comparative wealth, and ability to wait for the effect of their plans, and from better information and greater prudence. More recently, workmen have learnt to organise their proceedings, to collect a common fund, and to proceed by union of purpose, and too frequently by force. The great objects of the late statutes on this subject are, to give perfect freedom to voluntary agreement; and to prevent all threats, intimidation, and violence (a). 'Combinations either of masters or workmen for the purpose of restricting freedom of contracts for the employment of workmen are illegal at common law, and their rules cannot be enforced (b). But it has been enacted that the purposes of a trade union shall not, by reason merely that they are in restraint of trade, be unlawful so as to render void or voidable any agreement or trust (c). Further, where the rules of a society operated in illegal restraint of trade (e.g. by rules prohibiting its members from taking piece-work), it was held that it could not take the benefits of the Friendly Societies Act (18 and 19 Vict. c. 63, § 44) with regard to the settlement of disputes and the security of property (d). And the relaxation of the rule above mentioned is accompanied by such restrictions, that it is still difficult, but not impossible (e), to separate the "friendly" from the trade purposes of an ordinary trade union so as to get rid of the taint of illegality (f). By registration, however, under the Trade Union Act, 1871, these bodies obtain certain privileges for the protection of their property and rights (e).'

CHAPTER IV

OF THE CONTRACT OF LOAN

194. Nature and Kinds of Loan.
195-199. Commodate.
200-202A. Mutuum.

194. Nature and Kinds of Loan.—Loan is a real contract, by which the owner of a thing gives, for the temporary accommodation of another, the use or services derivable from it (a). There are two kinds of loan; one Proper, where a thing is lent for use, under an obligation to restore the same thing to the owner; the other Improper, in which the thing lent is transferred, on an obligation by the borrower to restore as much of the same kind, and of equal goodness. The former is Commodate, or Loan for Use; the latter Mutuum, or Loan for Consumption (b).

(a) See 1 Stair, 11. 3 Ersk. 1. § 18-25. 1 Bell's Com. 255. Pothier, Tr. de Prêt à l'Usage et de Consommation. Story on Bailments, 156. 2 Kent, Com. 573. Van Leeuwen, 337, 349.

(b) The distinction is of importance in bankruptcy, where, under the one contract, the lender, as creditor domini, is entitled to have his property restored; under the other he is a personal creditor, entitled only to a dividend. See § 211, 1315.

195. Commodate.—This (quasi commodatum) is a real contract of loan, for a certain use, without hire, and on an engagement, express or implied, that the identical thing lent shall be restored to the owner. The loan is either on time; or for a special occasion; or at will, which is also called Precarium (a).

(a) 3 Ersk. 1. § 20. Van Leeuwen, 349.

196. The loan is not complete till the thing has been delivered. But the terms on which the delivery is to be made may be proved by parole evidence. 'The lender, as he lends for beneficial use, is responsible for defects in the article lent, which make it dangerous or unprofitable for the purpose of the loan, and which are known to him (a).'

197. The borrower is bound to limit his use of the thing lent to that which is expressed or implied in the loan (a), and any excess will make the borrower responsible for any loss or damage (b). He must himself only take the use, not communicate it to others (c). He is bound to the most vigilant care (d), but is not liable for inevitable accidents occurring in the proper course of the use contemplated (e); 'or for damage done by the fault of third parties without any negligence of his own (f).' He is bound to restore the thing without faulty deterioration; and, according to the several kinds of the contract, either on the occasion being answered, or on the term having expired, or when the restoration is demanded; and if he fail, he will be liable for the damages consequent on his misconduct; or the lender may, in particular circumstances, be entitled to reject the thing, and insist for its value.

198. The borrower is entitled to retain for the reimbursement of extraordinary expense laid out on the thing, but not for any extraneous cause (a).

(a) Dig. cited above, § 196.

199. The property remains with the owner. The risk also is with him, unless the borrower shall be in fault; and as the loan is gratuitous, the slightest fault will make him responsible (a).

(a) Authorities, ut supra. Colville v. Fleming, 1693; 1 Fount. 544; 1 Ill. 151. Buchanan v. Baillie, 1696; 1 Fount. 712. See below, § 232.

200. Mutuum (quasi de meo tuum) is a real contract, by which one gives and transfers a fungible to another without hire, for use by consumption, on an engagement to restore as much of the same thing at the stipulated term. The loan of money (a) does not fully accord either with Mutuum, if interest stipulated or implied be held as profit and not as mere restitution; or with Locatio Rei, which is not proper to fungibles. But, setting aside the subtilty of the Roman law, the loan of money seems practically referable to Mutuum (b).

(a) As to proof of loan of money, see infra, § 2257, 202A.

(b) 1 Stair, 11. § 5. 3 Ersk. 1. § 18; Van Leeuwen, 337.

201. The obligation of the borrower confers only a personal right on the lender to demand the equivalent; ex. gr., if a commodity, to require an equal quantity of the same kind and quality, without regard to the difference of market value at the time. And so action will lie for the thing or its value as at the time and place stipulated for restoration, or otherwise at the time when a legitimate demand for restitution of the thing lent may be made. If money be lent, the current coin or nominal value of the sum lent is to be restored, not the intrinsic value (a).

(a) 1 Stair, 11. § 5. 3 Ersk. 1. § 18. 33 Vict. c. 10, § 6. 34 Vict. c. 47.

202. There is no counter-obligation on the lender. The property being transferred, he is liable neither for risk nor expense.

202A. 'Acknowledgments of Debt and I O U's do not require to be stamped (a). A holograph writing signed by the granter simply acknowledging receipt of money, and found in the possession of the lender, is enough to raise a presumption of loan, and in dubio implies an obligation to repay, requiring no further evidence (b), except (it may be) to prove the handwriting, or the fact of delivery, or the authority of the writer to bind the borrower (c).

While such a document raises a presumption of loan, and an I O U proves it, no such presumption arises from the mere payment of money. Thus the signature of the alleged borrower on the back of a cheque drawn in his favour does not show that the sum in the cheque was a loan, and does not even open the way to a proof prout de jure of the intention with which the payment was made, for loan of money can be proved only by writ or oath (d). But the granter of an I O U will in general be allowed to prove that the money for which it was given was received not in loan but on some other footing, or that it does not import a loan (e). An acknowledgment of debt, forming part of a transaction between third parties, and not delivered to the alleged creditor, is not proof of the debt, the obligation depending more on the creditor's possession of it than on the document itself (f).

'It has always been the rule of the law of Scotland that loan cannot be proved by parole, but only by writ of the borrower (g); and it has lately been settled by a majority of the whole Court that, like other obligations not needing writing for their constitution, loan does not require a solemnly attested deed as evidence of it, but only sufficiently clear writing or writings under the borrower's hand, parole being admissible to identify and set up the writings, but not to prove the obligation to repay (h).'

I. PLEDGE.

203. Nature and Constitution of Pledge.—

Pledge is a real contract, by which one places in the hands of his creditor a moveable subject, to remain with him in security of a debt or engagement, to be re-delivered on payment or satisfaction; and with an implied mandate, on failure to fulfil the engagement 'at the stipulated time or on demand (a),' to have the pledge sold by judicial authority (b).

(a) As to the effect of a stipulation that the debtor's right to the pledge shall ipso facto cease if repayment be not made within a certain time (pactum legis commissoriæ), see Stair, Ersk., and Domat, cit. (b). Addison on Contr. 745.

(b) See as to the doctrine of Pledge as a real security, and the distinction between Pledge, Hypothec, and Retention, § 1363, 1385, and 1410. As to the title of the pledgor, warranty, and the effect of a limited title in the pledgor, see Addison on Contr. 747, 748. See as to factor's power to pledge, infra, § 225 (c), 229, etc.

See 3 Ersk. Prin. 1. § 13. 1 Stair, 13. § 11. 3 Ersk. 1. § 33. 1 Bell's Com. 238 (258, M'L's ed.); 2. 21 sqq. 3 Domat, 3. tit. 7. § 1. Pothier, Tr. du Cont. de Nantissement. Ewing, 1836; 15 S. 8.

204. Pledge is constituted by the delivery of the subject, on terms or conditions, proved either by writing or by witnesses. The right of the creditor is continued by possession (a).

(a) Upon the question whether actual or corporeal possession is necessary, or constructive possession by an agent is enough, see below, § 1364.

205. The subject of pledge must be capable of delivery; such as corporeal moveables, goods, wares, and merchandise. Debts also may be pledged, when identified with the document, as in bills and notes. And so may title-deeds, as corporeal moveables, but not as carrying any interest in the land (a); 'and except in the case of a law agent's right of retention for his business accounts, such impignoration seems to be unavailing even against the proprietor pledging them, who may reclaim them as accessory to his right of property, much less against singular successors and creditors (b).'

206. The Creditor's Obligation is, to restore the subject of the pledge on payment of the debt; bestowing ordinary care in the custody of the subject while in his possession (a).

The Right of Property remains with the pledger, subject to the burden; and so the risk is with him. The creditor has no right of use during his possession; and the security expires with loss of possession. 'But it is not loss of possession extinguishing the security if the pledgee, having an assignable interest in the pledge, sub-pledges or even sells the pledge. In such a case the pledger, while he may claim damages for a wrongful act of the pledgee, cannot demand back the goods without tendering the full amount of the debt (b).'

Poynter & Co.*, 1894; A. C. 56; 22 R. H. L. 1.

207. Power to Sell.—By the Roman law, the contract included a mandate to sell. But with us the subject of the pledge cannot be sold without the order of a judge, which is obtained on a summary application to the Sheriff (a). In England and America no judicial authority is necessary (b).

(a) 1 Stair, 13. § 11. 3 Ersk. 1. § 33.

(b) Pothonier v. Dawson, Holt, 383; 1 Ill. 151. Pigott v. Chubley, 33 L. J. C. P. 134; 15 C. B. N. S. 301. Martin v. Read, 11 C. B. N. S. 730; 31 L. J. C. P. 126; 1 Smith's L. C. 192, 196. 2 Kent, 582. This is the rule also in France; Code Civil, No. 2078.

208. Montes Pietatis, etc.—On the principles of Pledge are grounded the Montes Pietatis of the Continent; the system of the warehousing of goods for the duties (a); and the occasional relief granted to traders by Government in the way of loan on goods deposited.

(a) See below, § 1368.

209. Pawnbroking is one species of Pledge, affording a resource to poverty, and a ready means to traders and manufacturers of raising occasional supplies. In order to prevent fraud and oppression, it has been subjected to special regulations by the Legislature. The great lines of this restraining policy are—1. That each pawnbroker shall take out an annual licence, and have his name as pawnbroker over his door; 'and therefore a secret partnership in the business of a pawnbroker is illegal and void (a).' 2. That he shall not take pawns before or after certain hours of the day, nor from persons intoxicated, or under twelve years of age. 3. That he shall record a description of each article pawned, with a special note of the name and abode of the pawner, and deliver a 'pawn-ticket in a statutory form' to the pawner, by which the article may be reclaimed. 4. That a certain rate of interest may be claimed; but 'the existing Act does not apply to advances of more than £10 on a single article.' 5. That the pawnbroker shall keep the article, 'if pledged for 10s. or under,' unsold for a year 'and seven days of grace, after which it becomes his property.'

6. That, in order to prevent depredations by workmen and apprentices, the pawnbroker shall be liable to certain penalties for taking in pawn unfinished goods. 7. That the pawns are forfeited at the end of the year, to the effect of entitling the pawnbroker to have them sold, unless notice be given for a further indulgence of three months. 8. That the sale must be public, after advertisement, if the sum advanced be above 10s., while certain goods must be sold by themselves. 9. That an account of the sale shall be entered in a book if 10s. have been advanced on the pawn, and the surplus proceeds of the sale, 'subject to any set-off the pawnbroker may have a right to,' paid over to the pawner, if claimed within three years (b). '10. The pawnbroker is bound to insure, and must, subject to certain deductions, make good the value of pledges destroyed or damaged by fire (c).'

On this Act it has been held a fraud—1. To advance more than £10 on one article, by dividing the sum into several tickets of £10 each (d). 2. That the expiration of the year does not, 'in the case of pledges for more than 10s.,' transfer the pawn; so that after the year, the pawn, if unsold, may be redeemed (e). 3. That no provision is made for securing a public sale or accounting for articles pledged for less than 10s. (f). 'That the indemnity given by the Act to a pawnbroker delivering the pledge to a person presenting the pawn-ticket does not affect the rights of the true owner of an article pledged without his knowledge or assent (g). The pawnbroker may sue for the deficit if the pawn when sold does not realise the amount lent (h).'

II. DEPOSIT.

210. Nature and Kinds of Deposit.—Deposit is a real contract, in which a corporeal moveable is delivered by the owner (or depositor) for custody on his account; the depositary engaging without hire to keep it safely, and restore it on demand (a). If hire be stipulated, the contract is Locatio operis. See above, § 155.

(a) See 1 Stair, 13. § 1. 3 Ersk. 1. § 26. 1 Bell's Com. 257 (277, M'L. s ed.). Pothier, Tr. de Dépôt.

211. Deposit is Proper or Improper. It is Proper, where a specific subject (or a fungible made specific) is placed in deposit, to be specifically returned: Improper, where fungibles not kept distinguishable are deposited for the return of an equal quantity; as money with a banker. In the former the property remains unchanged, the rule being, "Rei depositæ proprietates apud deponentem manet sed et possessio." In the latter the property is not preserved, the depositor being a mere creditor (a).

(a) Pothier, Tr. de Dépôt, No. 18 et seq. and No. 82. S. Austral. Ins. Co. v. Randell, L. R. 3 P. C. 101. Marine Bank v. Fulton Bank, 2 Wallace, 256. Thompson v. Riggs, 5 Wallace, 663.

212. The Obligation of the Depositary is to keep the thing with reasonable care, and not to use it unless with permission express or implied; nor to penetrate into or disclose any secret which may be included in the trust, as by breaking open a packet or box (a). But he is not liable for the contents of a packet, casket, etc., if restored precisely as he received it, and uninjured (b). 'Reasonable care in a gratuitous depositary is such care as a man of common prudence generally exercises about his own property of like description (c). But, while it is generally enough to repel the presumption of negligence in a gratuitous bailee that he has taken the same care of the thing deposited as of his own goods, the loss of his own property at the same time is no defence when it is proved that he has been guilty of negligence (d).'

The thing deposited is subject to attachment by creditors of the depositor, and to retention by the depositary for what he may have expended on the subject, but not for any debt otherwise due (e).

There is a distinction to be observed between the simple deposit for custody, and for safe keeping. The latter implies a greater degree of care and vigilance, and may either be expressly enjoined, or implied from the very nature of the deposit, as in the case of jewels or plate sent to a banker's while a family is in the country (f). The risk is with the owner when the thing perishes without fault (g). But if the thing be not restored in due time, the depositary will be liable for damages or the value, with the benefit to the depositor of his oath in litem (h).

Joint depositaries are liable in solidum (i).

Stewart*, 1871, 9 Macph. 957; but eviction by the true owner will be a good defence, and legal interpellation by adverse claimants may require him to retain. Id. p. 960. 213. The Obligation of the Depositor is to reimburse the depositary of his necessary charges, and to receive back the deposit.

214. Sequestration is classed as a species of deposit, and is either voluntary or judicial, the subject being placed in the hands of a neutral party, to abide the issue of some controversy or reference on which the right depends (a).

(a) Ersk. 1. § 30. See below, § 2338.

215. Consignation of Money is deposit (a). The occasions are: redemption of a wadset or pledge; refusal of the creditor to take his money; a sum in medio in a competition by multiplepoiniding; a demand for money, suspended; 'deposit of money with a stakeholder to abide the result of a lawful game or race (b); or with an auctioneer or bank to abide the fulfilment of the conditions of a sale (c).' The risk is with him who is in fault, or who consigns only a part, or in improper hands selected by himself (d). The consignatory must keep the sum consigned in safety till called for, and is not entitled to part with it; and, as a counterpart, is not liable for interest. But now consignment is made in banks, and bank interest is due (e).

216. Nature and Proof of Mandate.—Mandate is a consensual contract, completed by acceptance of the mandate (a). The mandate and the acceptance may both be proved by parole evidence, or by writing, or by circumstances (b), 'and this, even where a contract made by an agent is in writing, to the effect of introducing into the contract, e.g. as the purchaser of land, a party not named in the written document (c).'

217. Mandate was in the Roman law, and is still in Scotland, a binding contract, by which one empowers another to manage any business for him without hire. But it has with us been almost superseded by agency or factory, which is the employment of another for hire, to do business as factor for the employer (a).

(a) 3 Ersk. 3. § 31. M'Donald v. Kellie, 1821; 1 S. 101; 1 Ill. 152. Paley, Principal and Agent, 100. Davidson v. Robertson, 1815; 3 Dow, 218. 2 Kent, Com. 613. •

218. Gratuitous Mandate is constituted by consent, and binds the mandatary who accepts (a) to execute the order express or implied, to account for his intromissions, and to restore what is entrusted in him; empowers him to do all that is necessary to fulfil the order; entitles him to reimbursement of his advances or outlays, and relief from his engagements, but gives him no right to remuneration; and, leaving the property and risk of the things entrusted to him with the mandant, it entitles the mandant to revoke the mandate rebus integris (b). 'A gratuitous agent will not be held bound to the highest degree of diligence if he act fairly and to the best of his ability, or, as it is sometimes said, he will be liable only for gross negligence. But the latter phrase is rather misleading, and his responsibility is properly described in the same terms as that of a depositary (c), supra, § 212. A skilled workman, when he undertakes, even gratuitously, to perform any act within the scope of his art, spondet peritiam, and is responsible for want of skill (d).'

(a) The law of Scotland does not recognise a distinction, which seems to be admitted in England, between non-feasance and malfeasance; and which mainly proceeds on the ground that an engagement without consideration is a pactum nudum, which will not sustain an action. Smith, Merc. Law, 116. Story, § 164 sqq. Coggs v. Bernard, 1 Smith's L. C. 200; 216, 218. The author refers to the rule that no action for non-performance will lie against a gratuitous promiser; but if his undertaking has commenced, he will be liable to his principal for damage by his misconduct, since he has prevented another from being employed, which is held a sufficient consideration to support the contract.

219. Mercantile Agency or Factory.—In this more useful relation, where the agent receives an adequate reward for his exertions, it is important to distinguish between General and Special agency, both as in relation to the parties themselves and to the public; the one raising a general credit, the other requiring special powers.

General Agents.—An agent or factor for a merchant residing abroad is held 'by a presumption of fact founded on the improbability that credit should be given to a foreigner' as his general agent, and as such is responsible to the merchants here for the price of goods furnished to his principal on his order (a); 'but this is not a rule of law; and in each case it is a question of evidence whether the agent in this country of a disclosed foreign principal guarantees the solvency of his constituent, or binds him as a party to the contract (b). But when a foreigner instructs a commission agent or commission merchant in this country to purchase goods for him, there is, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, a general usage that no privity of contract exists between the foreign correspondent and the seller in this country (c). In the same way, one who, acting as factor for a merchant, has been recognised by him in a train of dealings as his general representative, will, by his engagements for his principal within the scope of an agent's authority, bind him, although he may have received special instructions; but still this power will be restrained and qualified by the character of power, as derived from many instances, and within the fair scope of those dealings (d).

Special Agents (e) are persons employed in a particular line,—as a riding agent, a collecting agent, a law agent. Their powers are similar to those of a factor, but limited to the particular line entrusted to them:—

(1.) Brokers are limited agents, employed in the negotiation of contracts relative to property not entrusted to their custody; having power to bind their principals, in relation to the particular transaction, by the entry in their books, and the passing of "Bought and Sold notes" between the parties, reserving to the principal a power of objecting to the credit of the buyer (f). And this office of a broker, though sometimes confounded with that of factor, is carefully to be distinguished; as he is in no shape empowered to bind the principal without particular mandate (g), or the possession of the goods (h). 'In modern practice he frequently performs the further function of passing a delivery order to the seller for his signature, and passing it when signed to the purchaser; but in all this he is merely an intermediary or negotiator, and so long as he acts in this way only as a broker, not assuming to have any use, property, or possession of the goods either for himself or another, he incurs no personal liability (i). Neither, as a general rule, can one sue on a contract which he has made, as a broker, for a named principal (k). He may, however, make himself liable and entitled to sue on the contract by making it in his own name (l), and evidence of custom (as explaining, not contradicting the contract) is admitted to show that in particular trades brokers not disclosing the names of principals at the time of the contract are personally liable (m). But a custom which is such as to alter the essential character of a contract (as by converting a broker employed to buy, into a principal to sell to his employer) is not binding on a principal who is ignorant of it (n).'

Stockbrokers who buy and sell in the public funds, or in the funds 'shares or stock' of joint-stock companies, are special agents. 'Those who employ them are bound by the rules and usages of the Stock Exchange (o), so far as they are not unreasonable or unlawful (p). In the practice of the Stock Exchange there are generally intermediate sales between the seller and ultimate purchaser to whom the shares are transferred (see § 400, 403r); and the contract of the first purchaser (jobber) is held to be that he will either take the shares himself at settling day, in which case he is bound to accept and register a transfer, and to indemnify against calls made between the executory sale and the registration of the transfer, or that he will give the name of a transferee to whom no reasonable objection can be made, and who is willing and able to accept and pay for the shares (q). The contract imports no undertaking by the seller that the company will register the transferee (r). Provincial stockbrokers take orders for the purchase or sale of stocks in London or elsewhere; they employ brokers of their own selection as correspondents to execute those orders for buying or selling at a distance, which they transmit: they are directly liable for the correct execution of those orders, and cannot relieve themselves by shifting the responsibility to those whom they employ, and of whom their employers know nothing.

Shipbrokers employed in the buying and selling and freighting of ships are special agents; they adjust the terms of venditions, charter-parties, and bills of lading, and settle with passengers the room and terms of their passage. 'They are entitled by usage, apart from employment, to commission from the shipowner or shipbuilder, provided—1. that the negotiations terminate in a contract, and 2. that they have been effectually originated by them, even although the charty-party or contract be completed by another broker, or by the principal without their intervention (s).'

Insurance Brokers are also special agents for effecting insurance, selecting proper underwriters, arranging the premium and terms of the policy, and keeping an account on the one hand with the assured, and on the other with the underwriters, debiting or crediting each with the premium, as middlemen for settling the payment of it. 'The insurance broker is agent for both parties: for the insured to effect the policy; and when, in accordance with usual practice, it is left in his hands, also by implied mandate to collect and adjust in case of loss; for the underwriter as to the premium, but no farther. He is also a principal to receive the premiums from the assured, and pay them to the underwriter, the rule of law being that the broker is the debtor of the underwriter for the premiums, and the underwriter the debtor of the assured for losses (t).'

(2.) Supercargoes are special agents, but coming very near to the character of general factor; being presumed to be invested with full power over the cargo and its destination, and the investment of the proceeds for a return; being so accredited by the possession of the goods (u).

(3.) A Ship's-husband is a special agent to act with regard to a particular ship as shipbroker, to manage the outfit and provide necessities, and to settle the freight and charter-party. But he holds no general authority, even to insure the ship. See below, § 449.

(4.) A Procurator to draw or accept Bills is a special agent, whose powers must be examined in order effectually to bind the principal. See below, § 321.

(5.) Wharfingers, though with possession of goods, are special agents; having no power beyond their particular business or special mandate (v).

(6.) A Traveller or Rider for a manufacturing or mercantile house is a limited agent. His powers are regulated by his appointment; but he has a tacit mandate by custom to receive payment for his principal, and to take orders for him, to the effect of binding him to performance (w).

(7.) A Law Agent (x) is not a general, but a limited agent. The adverse party is not entitled to rely on him as holding a general authority. As between the agent and client, a mandate must be proved, by writing, correspondence, delivery of papers, signing of papers in an action conducted by the agent, revising or approving of the agent's papers or proceedings, or paying his accounts (y), 'or by possession of the service copy of a summons (z).' But it is not enough that proceedings have been publicly carried on by the agent in the client's name (aa), nor that one has given information to an agent relative to a suit, unless he has authorised him to act for him (bb). In relation to third parties, the agent may employ a sub-agent when necessary (cc). 'But, while agreements between law agents acting for the same client to share fees or profits are now lawful, "a law agent authorised and acting for a client whom he discloses shall incur no liability to any other law agent employed by him, except such as he shall expressly undertake in writing" (dd). The powers of a law agent are those necessary or usual in that business or employment. A power to recover payment of debt is held to confer a discretionary power in the use of diligence (ee); but a messenger has no such power, nor is he entitled to receive payment (ff).

Power to refer or compromise—Counsel.—'It is said by Professor Bell that' neither agent nor counsel has with us power to enter into a reference of the cause in which he is employed (gg). 'But the case cited applies only to law agents, and there can be no doubt that it is within the province of counsel to bind his client by a reference of the subject-matter of the cause. His authority, unless openly withdrawn and repudiated, is absolute over the whole conduct of the litigation for which he is retained, including the abandonment or compromise of a claim or a defence, or of the whole cause (hh); but of course it does not extend to matters collateral or external to those embraced in the action (ii).'

Negligence of Law Agent.—A law agent is responsible for professional negligence or want of skill, as in not using the due means for recovering a debt (kk); not duly negotiating a bill; using a wrong stamp; not objecting to an insolvent cautioner in a suspension; taking a bad and informal security (ll); 'omitting, without express assent of the buyer or lender for whom he acts, to have the records searched for incumbrances (mm)'; laying an action on a wrong statute or section of a statute (ll); 'ignorance of changes in professional practice, whether occasioned by decisions or statutes (nn); executing diligence on an obviously informal and inept decree (oo); want of reasonable care and skill and due communication of the facts when employed to lend money and select or advise as to securities (pp). But a law agent does not guarantee that his advice shall be correct in law. He is liable only for "want of reasonable skill," or for "gross ignorance," and must show himself acquainted with the ordinary practice of his profession (qq). He is not personally liable for what he does bonâ fide in obedience to the orders of counsel in the conduct of a cause (rr).

'(8.) Patent Agents.—There is now a Register of Patent Agents, under rules made by the Board of Trade, and an Institute of Patent Agents formed under Royal Charter (ss).'

(e) It cannot be said that the distinction of general and special agents is very satisfactory, so far as the terminology is concerned; and it must be noticed that the rule that general agents bind their principals, even although they exceed their instructions, applies to the agents here classified as special, so long as they do not exceed the powers which by his conduct or by the usage of trade the principal holds them out as possessing. See authorities in note (d).

In England, where much litigation has taken place as to the effect of broker's notes and the entry in his books, with regard to the Statute of Frauds, it seems now to be held that the entry in the books constitutes the contract, and that the notes, being identical, are sufficient evidence of it. 220. Obligations of the Agent.—The agent must perform what he undertakes, or what the mandant or principal is entitled to rely upon as undertaken; otherwise he will be liable in damages (a). But there is an exception to this, where by illness or inevitable accident the agent is prevented from performing the undertaking.

It has been held that an agent bound to relieve his principal of a contract made in excess of his powers, is vested with rights of action, e.g. of reduction or damages for fraud, which would have been competent to the principal against the other party to the contract. Milne v. Ritchie, 1882; 10 R. 365.

221. He must act with the care and diligence of a man of ordinary prudence in the line of the employment (a).

222. He must account to the mandant or principal for his administration, and pay over, restore, or give up to him all that he may have received in his name, or as acting for him (a). But, acting with due precaution, he is not liable for the buyer's insolvency, unless on a del credere commission (b). 'An agent is bound to maintain the most entire good faith, and make the fullest disclosure of all facts and circumstances concerning his principal's business. He cannot, therefore, deal on his own account in the business of the agency without the principal's full knowledge and assent; and if he do so (as by secretly buying for himself what he is employed to sell, or secretly selling his own goods to the principal who employs him to buy, or by taking any profit whatever from the other party arising out of the business), the principal is entitled to claim from him, and the agent is bound to account for, any benefit or profit he has obtained (c); or in his option, and if the third parties dealing with the agent were cognisant of the agent's employment and position, to repudiate and avoid the transaction (d). Any surreptitious or concealed dealing between one principal and the agent of another principal is a fraud (e).'

In accounting or in paying money, the rules are, that the agent must, in remitting money, follow any directions given by the principal, or take the risk of the remittance (f); that he must, when no directions are given, remit through a chartered bank, or at least a banker reputed at the time to be in good credit, or follow the mercantile custom or local usage (g); that if he pay into his own general account, he will be liable to the risk of the banker's failure (h); that if he put his own name as drawer or indorser on the bill by which the money is sent, he will be liable as indorser (i).

224A. 'Undisclosed Principal—Election.—

In all cases the intention of the parties to a contract determines whether the principal or the agent is liable on the contract, and entitled to enforce it: the question is, to whom was credit given? (a). Subject to this general rule, it is held—1. That a contract with a known agent is a contract with his principal, and that if the principal be named or known at the time, there is prima facie no contract with the agent (b); unless expressly or by clear implication he assumes liability (c). 2. That if the principal is not named, the agent is personally bound (d). 3. That in general (e) one who is really an agent, even though not known to be so, contracts for his undisclosed principal, and binds him as well as himself (f). But in this case the other contracting party, when sued, may avail himself of a set-off or other equity against the agent which has accrued before the disclosure (g). 4. That the other contracting party, on discovering the principal (h), may elect (both being liable under 2 and 3) to give credit to the agent only, whereby he liberates the principal; and this may be effected by statements or by conduct which cause the principal to alter his position (i); and in like manner by taking to the principal he will liberate the agent (k). A party contracting with an agent is not deprived of his right to elect the principal as his debtor by reason of the principal's having made payment to the agent, or of the state of accounts between them having been changed, unless by his conduct he has led the principal to believe that he has settled with the agent, or perhaps (as when the agency was not known to him) the payment was made when the principal had reason to believe that the other party still relied on the agent's credit alone (l).

224B. 'Misrepresentations made or Fraud committed by agents, acting in the course of their employment and for their principals' benefit, have the same effect as if they had been made or committed by the principals; i.e. the person misled or deceived may rescind a contract so induced, or he may claim damages against the principal, founding on the agent's wrong, for there is no sensible distinction between fraud and any other wrong (a). But when one is induced by the fraud of the servants or agents of a corporation to become a shareholder in it, and its declared insolvency or liquidation has made it impossible for him to rescind the contract, he can no longer claim damages from the company, because he remains a member of it, and has himself contracted to contribute to the payment of its debts and liabilities (b). An agent or servant or director is always personally liable in damages for fraud committed in the business of his principal; for all persons directly concerned in the commission of a fraud or other wrong are to be treated as principals (c). An agent is not liable for a misrepresentation innocently made by him on behalf of his principal (d); nor in general for the fraud of his co-agent in which he does not participate (e).'

225. Agent's Powers.—The rules observed as to the agent's powers are: that where the terms are express, the limits are absolute (a); that his power and his duty must be regulated by the ordinary acts and skill and knowledge of persons in that line (b); but that where any power is necessary or reasonable to be exercised, in order to the accomplishment of the purpose, it is implied (c); and that an agent or factor at a distance, and in difficult circumstances, will be discharged if he act with sound discretion (d). A factor has power to sell or even to pledge the goods of his principal for advances (e); 'but apart from this power allowed to persons possessing the character of factor, an agent, however wide his authority in conducting his principal's business, has no implied power to borrow money on his credit (f), or to grant obligations out of the ordinary course of business, e.g. gratuitous or cautionary obligations (g). An agent in possession of securities, and authorised to use them for the purpose of raising money, binds the principal to any extent to which money is truly advanced, although he has fraudulently exceeded a limit fixed by his principal, and applied the difference to his own purposes. Secus, if he be lawfully in possession of the securities, but without such authority (h).'

Mercantile mandates are extended, restrained, or qualified, and, in general, are aided, by the settled rules and usage of trade (i).

In cases of partial execution, it is necessary to distinguish whether the mandate be indivisible, or such as may be executed effectually in parts (k).

Under due observance of the distinction between general authority and limited powers, third parties are entitled to deal with a factor or agent as principal (l); either in purchasing the goods in his hands, or in taking them in pledge, or in advancing money on a consignment of them. But no one is entitled to trust a limited agent beyond the strict limits of his employment, without calling for and perusing the authority by which his powers are extended. And no sub-factor or third party is entitled to rely on possession of goods given him by the agent, as raising a lien, or resulting right of retention, for a general balance (m).

'A person professing to contract as agent, but having no authority or no responsible principal, or exceeding his powers, is liable to third parties, not on the contract, but on his implied undertaking that he had authority, for the loss actually sustained by reason of such third parties not having the valid contract he professed to make with them (n). A factor or commissioner whose factory empowers him to sue actions in his principal's affairs may sue in his own name (o).'

(a) See Hastie v. Campbell, 1857; 19 D. 557.

228. Recall of Mandate.—The factory or mandate, as having relation to the public as well as to the parties, may be recalled, by revocation as between the parties, if done tempestivè, though that may not be sufficient to affect third parties unless accompanied by notice (a): by death, which is revocation (b); but transactions begun previous to the death may go on, and those done in ignorance of the death are effectual (c): by renunciation, if not made re infecta (d): by appointment of a new factor or agent to do the same act (e): but the mandate seems to subsist notwithstanding supervening insanity (f), 'at least until recalled by some public act, or till parties dealing with the agent are put in bad faith by having knowledge of the principal's insanity (g). And an authority coupled with an interest cannot be revoked, whether it be conferred originally on a creditor (procurator in rem suam), or arise by reason of the agent or factor incurring liabilities to third parties in the business of the agency (h).'

229. Institorial Power is an implied mandate raised by acquiescence, or common usage, in several situations.

(1.) Consignment.—It is a frequent arrangement in trade to consign goods to a likely market, getting perhaps an advance of money on them, or being allowed to draw bills on the faith of the consignment. A mandate is implied empowering the consignee to sell the goods at the price and time most expedient in his judgment (a); and if the consignee have made or got advances on the goods, or accepted bills, his mandate to sell is held to subsist and to be assignable till he is reimbursed or relieved (b). This rests on common law in Scotland; but in England a factor has such power only by Act of Parliament (c). 'There is a tendency to confuse the relation of agent and principal when it takes this form with that of buyer and seller. When the agent is bound to pay to the principal at a price fixed beforehand without reference to the price at which he sells, being at liberty to sell at any price and take payment in any form or at any time he himself may fix, his real position is that of buyer and not agent, and the principal has no right to the specific proceeds of the agent's sales, but is merely a creditor for the original price (d).'

230. (2.) Procuration.—When acts of management have been recognised by the principal (as in the drawing and indorsing of bills by a clerk, or in receipts by clerks for shop accounts), a mandate authorising the person whose acts are so recognised is implied (a).

231. (3.) Institor.—When one places another at the head of an establishment, he is held to bind himself by the dealings of such substitute 'within the lawful and ordinary course of business'; and the person who has the management of a shop 'or business' has a presumed general authority to bind his principal by his proper acts of administration as shopkeeper 'or manager' (a). 'But the largest powers of a general manager, even when he has power to accept bills and open a bank account, do not imply the power of borrowing money on the principal's credit (b).'

(4.) Præpositura.—A wife is præposita negotiis domesticis; or authorised to bind her husband in any trade, etc., which she superintends with his acquiescence (c). And a similar authority is held to be given to the person placed at the head or in management of the domestic establishment (d).

(5.) Exercitor.—One in the command of a ship has an implied power to bind his principal (e).

(6.) Bank Agent.—Institorial power as applied to banks has raised many questions; with regard to which distinctions seem admissible between the managers and officers at the proper domicile of the bank, and agents or branch establishments at a distance. In the former case, the public is entitled to trust to the full unlimited institorial power in dealing with any officer placed in the apparent trust of receiving money; in the latter, the agent or manager has certain general powers, but which are to be admitted with great caution, and rather to be taken as a limited agency, regulated by the terms of his appointment,—the principal being liable only for acts done by the agent in the proper character of agent (f).

232. Doctrine of Risk in Culpa.—The general rule respecting Risk in the contracts already explained (with the exception of Sale ‘according to the common law of Scotland’) is, “Res perit domino” (a). In Sale, on the principles already explained, the risk is with the buyer; in location, with the lessor; in commodate, with the lender; in pledge, with the debtor; and in mandate, with the employer. But this doctrine of risk applies to the case of accidental loss only,—not to that in which there is a fault, either actual or presumed. Where there is fault, the great rule is, that he by whose fault or neglect the loss has arisen is liable for the consequences. The proper method of applying this practically is by the verdict of a jury; but lawyers (especially where jury trial has not prevailed) have endeavoured to frame a set of artificial rules for measuring due diligence and care. These attempts have reference to the several degrees of reliance which, in the several contracts, it is necessary or convenient that parties should repose in each other’s diligence in the performance of their part. And the principles on which this depends resolve into the two doctrines of—1. Diligence prestatable in the ordinary course of contracts; and 2. The peculiar responsibility of common carriers.

233. In order to settle a scale by which to regulate the degree of care or diligence to be observed in the several contracts, and to which lawyers might in their reasonings refer, two extreme points have been fixed, with a middle point or average: the one extreme is the vigilance of a miser, or at least of a very prudent and careful man; the other, the prodigality of a spendthrift, amounting to folly in one’s own affairs, and approximating to fraud in the management of another man’s concerns; the middle point is the ordinary diligence of a man of ordinary prudence. Neglect of the middle or average care and attention is called “culpa levis”; the want of extreme vigilance is called “culpa levissima”; the want of that care which even careless and prodigal persons observe in their own affairs, is called “culpa lata, dolo proxima” (a).

‘But the classification of negligence into three degrees is now discredited and disused, and even that of negligence and gross negligence has been questioned. Negligence is in all cases a jury question, to be decided according to the circumstances; for in different cases there are different degrees of responsibility for negligence varying according to the kind and extent of the duty neglected; e.g. according as an agent acts gratuitously or not, or in the cases mentioned in the next paragraph (b).’

234. Rules of Liability.—The general rules for applying the scale are these :—

(1.) Culpa Lata.—In contracts beneficial only to the owner (as deposit and gratuitous mandate), the possessor of the property is bound to good faith, and liable for culpa lata only. But this must of course be much regulated by circumstances, since what in some cases and with some persons may be held an innocent omission, and no other than what was to be expected, will in other circumstances and with other persons be gross and faulty neglect (a). This obligation to care may be enlarged, by officiousness in undertaking the trust; or, practically, where the public is entitled to rely on the skill of a professional or official person (b).

(2.) Culpa Levis.—In contracts reciprocally beneficial, the care of a man of ordinary prudence is required: so culpa levis will ground responsibility as against the hirer in location; the creditor in pledge; the mandatary or agent in factory; and the partners in society (c).

(3.) Culpa Levissima.—In contracts beneficial only to him who has the possession (as commodate), vigilance is required; and the possessor is liable for slight neglect, or culpa levissima (d).

(4.) Fraud, etc.—The regular rule of responsibility is altered by fraud, which at all times grounds responsibility; by forcible or faulty withholding of possession; and by public policy, in the cases included under the next section.

(d) Story, § 237. These general rules, though long established, are not very precise; and indeed, a priori, it is scarcely possible to fix a criterion or rule of care. The general direction in point of law already alluded to (§ 232), with the verdict of a jury on the particular circumstances of each case, will best determine questions of this sort.

235. Responsibility of Carriers, etc. (a).—The ordinary rule of responsibility under the obligations of the contract, is enlarged in certain cases supposed to be peculiarly exposed to the dangers of collusion and carelessness. The rule is, that common carriers, innkeepers, and stablers are responsible for the loss of things committed to their charge, although no neglect can be proved, if such loss do not arise from natural and inevitable accident, the act of God or of the king's enemies. This policy was established in Rome by the Prætor's edict. It has been adopted by most of the nations of modern Europe who have recognised the Roman law. In England it has been referred to the custom of the realm. The object is safety to employers on occasions in which the danger of collusion and fraudulent association is imminent: and to this end, a presumption has been introduced, that fraud or negligence has occasioned the loss; to which the only admissible answer is evidence that the loss has proceeded from an act of God or of the king's enemies (b).

'But this extraordinary responsibility ceases when the carrier has fulfilled his duty by conveying the goods to the place directed, and offering them, if a carrier by land, to the proper person. If the consignee does not exist, or cannot be found, or refuses or delays to receive the goods, the carrier becomes an ordinary depositary or warehouseman, bound only to exercise due care, and to deliver the goods to the consignor on being paid his ordinary charges (c), including his reasonable expenses incurred for preservation of the goods after the termination of the transit (d). Neither does it exist to the full extent if the goods carried are not placed in the exclusive custody and control of the carrier, e.g. if a railway passenger chooses to have his luggage in the carriage in which he travels, in which case the company is not answerable for loss or injury to which the passenger's own negligence has contributed (e). After the transit has ceased, the carrier's liability continues for such time as may be reasonable and usual for allowing the consignee to take possession of the goods (f); after which he has only the responsibility of a warehouseman (g). In haulage contracts (e.g. where a railway company carries a merchant's goods in his own waggons) it seems that the company is a common carrier of the goods (coals), and in returning empty waggons to the pit is liable for the same care as in a contract of location (h).'

236. Persons subject to the Rule.—All persons are subject to the rule, who, in the capacity of Carriers, Innkeepers, or Stablers, hold themselves out to the public generally as trustworthy in those employments, and undertake all its responsibilities for hire (a).

(1.) Public Carriers by water, or masters and owners of merchant ships employed in transporting goods generally for hire; smacks; passage-boats; canal-boats; steam-packets; barges; ferry-boats; lighters; are within this description (b). So are

(2.) Land Carriers.—Waggoners, carriers, mail and stage coach owners, canal and railway carriers (c), taking a price for carriage; carters and porters who offer themselves for hire to carry goods from one part of a city to another (d). Hackney coachmen are not within the rule, unless when employed as carriers and paid for carriage (e).

(3.) Wharfingers have sometimes been said to be under the rule, almost in the character of carriers; but this does not seem to be settled. Wharfingers and warehousemen are on the same footing; and unless where (as sometimes happens) the wharfinger or warehouseman combines the character of carrier or lighterman, his liability seems to be only under the contract (f).

(4.) Innkeepers, Vintners, and Stablers are also liable for things placed under their charge or that of their servants, or brought by guests or employers (g) within the house or premises (h). But to this there is an exception, where the guest undertakes specially the care of his own effects (i); which will not, however, be inferred from merely locking up the articles for greater security (k). 'An innkeeper's liability is limited to £30 for any kind of traveller's property, not being a horse or other live animal, or its gear, or any carriage, except where the injury has arisen from the wilful act or neglect of him or his servants, and except the thing have been deposited expressly for safe custody, provided always he print and display conspicuously in the hall or entry to his inn the terms of the Act introducing this limitation (l).'

Where persons are not properly innkeepers, but letters of lodgings, they seem not to be within the rule; though the question is not settled (m).

(5.) Post Office.—In the great carrying establishment of the post office, instead of the policy of this law, penal statutes have been enacted to enforce and secure vigilance in the officers employed (n). But although the Postmaster-General and the establishment are not liable, postmasters who carry on the details of this business are bound by all the liabilities of their contract (o).

237. Extent and Proof of Liability.—The rule is, that persons thus responsible must restore the thing in the same condition in which it was received, barring inevitable accident (a); and that they will be liable for damage by total or by temporary loss (b).

(a) 1 Stair, 13. § 3. 3 Ersk. 1. § 28. 1 Bankt. p. 379, § 1. 1 Selwyn, N. P. 345. Jones on Bailments, 104. The author seems to use the terms "inevitable accident," and "pure accident," 1 Bell's Com. 579, comp. 470, 559 (625, 499, 606, M'L's ed.), as equivalent to "act of God." This exception is thus defined by James, L. J.: "A common carrier is not liable for any accident as to which he can show that it was due to natural causes, directly and exclusively, without human intervention, and that it could not have been prevented by any amount of foresight, pains, and care reasonably to be expected from him." Nugent v. Smith, 45 L. J. C. P. 19, 697; 1 Q. B. D. 423, in which case, and in Nitro-Phosphate Co. v. St. Katherine's Dock Co., L. R. 9 Ch. D. 503; 39 L. T. 433, the definition is much discussed. See Nicholls v. Marsland, 2 Ex. D. 1;

(b) Ogilvie v. Taylor, 1828; 6 S. 691; 1 Ill. 169. Millen v. Brash, 51 L. J. Q. B. 167.

238. (1.) Robbery and Theft.—Neither Robbery nor Theft is in Scotland held to be inevitable accident (a). The great object of the policy of the rule is to guard against the collusion to which employers are thus exposed; and the presumption is, that co-operation, not mischance, has led to the loss (b). And yet in one case, where there was no room for suspicion, 'theft by housebreaking' was held a good defence (c). 'Owners of seagoing ships are not liable for loss or damage, without their actual privity, to gold, silver, diamonds, watches, jewels, or precious stones, by robbery, embezzlement, making away with or secreting thereof, unless the true value is inserted in bills of lading or otherwise declared in writing (d).'

(a) In England and in America the carrier or innkeeper is regarded as an insurer. See 1 Bell, Com. 469.

239. (2.) Fire 'was,' in Scotland, held an inevitable accident in the sense of the law, so as to free the carrier or innkeeper from responsibility, unless where fraud or collusion 'could' be shown (a). 'But by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act carriers for hire of goods within Scotland are liable to make good to the owners all losses arising from accidental fire, while such goods are in their custody or possession (b). Owners of seagoing ships are by statute not liable to make good loss arising without their actual fault or privity to goods on board their ships by reason of any fire happening on board such ships (c).'

743; 22 L. J. Q. B. 250. This came in lieu of a like enactment in 26 Geo. III. c. 86, repealed by 17 and 18 Vict. c. 120. It applies only to the shipowner's liability as carrier, and does not relieve him from contributing in general average when goods are injured by reason of fire on board. Schmidt v. R. M. Steamship Co., 45 L. J. Q. B. 646.

240. (3.) Servants.—Fraud and negligence of servants are no excuse. Servants are identified with their master, and the policy of the law is to protect against them, and all possibility of collusion (a). But the goods must be delivered to servants regularly, and so as to charge the master (b).

241. (4.) Perils of the Sea excuse only when unavoidable, as rocks, sandbanks, or collision by force of the winds. They furnish no defence if the ship or goods be exposed to danger by unskilfulness 'or negligence (a) in navigating or managing the carrying ship (b),' or by deviation from the proper course of the voyage (c). 'Damage directly done to the cargo by rats is not within the exception of sea perils; and the shipowner is responsible for it under the ordinary terms of the contract, that risk not being peculiar to the sea (d). But he will not (it seems) be liable if he has used every effort to extirpate or exclude them (e). And if rats gnaw a hole by which sea-water gets in and damages the cargo, that is within the exemption, the sea being the immediate cause of the loss (f).'

242A. (6.) The Measure of Damages is the market price of the goods at the port of delivery, apart from any circumstances peculiar to the plaintiff, or accidental as between him and the carrier, e.g. a sale by the plaintiff before arrival (a).'

243. Limitation of Responsibility.—The responsibility established on principles of public policy, only formerly limited by contract, is limited now by legislative enactment (a).

(a) See below, § 436.

244. The responsibility for carriage was formerly limited by special contract, either express; or implied, from notice, and the requiring of an additional payment to compensate greater risk. This had to a certain extent been admitted as effectual, on the principle of implied assent, not of mere notice; in which respect the Scottish rule was more correct than the English (a). But the various and difficult questions which arose on the construction of notices, and on the evidence of their being communicated to the parties, led to legislative regulation 'limiting responsibility in certain cases.'

The responsibility of mail-contractors, stage-coach proprietors, or other common carriers by land, is (b) limited as to gold or silver coin, or gold or silver manufactured or unmanufactured, watches, clocks, trinkets, jewellery, bank-notes 'of any bank in England, Scotland, or Ireland, bills, cheques, deeds, engravings, china, furs, glass (c), lace (d), maps, orders, or securities for payment of money, paintings (e), pictures (e), plate or plated articles, silks (f), manufactured or not, and whether or not wrought up with other articles; stamps, precious stones, etc., 'contained in any parcel or package (g);'

whether delivered for carriage on hire or accompanying passengers, when beyond the value of £10; unless the description and value be declared (h), and an increased charge paid, 'if demanded (i),' at the commencement of the carriage (k). In such cases the carrier may charge an additional sum, according to a table to be affixed in his office, which shall be sufficient notice (l), 'to all persons sending such goods, without further proof of its having come to their knowledge (m)'; but he is bound to give a receipt if required (n). They cannot limit their responsibility for other articles by any notice (o); but special contracts are not affected by the Act (p). 'Special contracts, however, exempting common carriers from all responsibility even for their own misconduct, though formerly held invalid (q), were maintained in later cases not within the Railway Traffic Act (r). The liability of common carriers for goods extends to passengers' luggage, even when carried with the passenger in the carriage (s), and so the Act applies to such luggage, and a declaration must be made, and extra charge paid in order to fix liability for value above £10 (t). The Act protects carriers even when goods are negligently carried beyond their destination (u). It protects from liability for loss (v), even when occasioned by the gross negligence of the carrier's servants (w), but not for loss by their felonious acts or delicts (x).'

244A. 'The Railway and Canal Traffic Act.

—The exception of special contracts in this statute having enabled railway companies to create for themselves exemptions from responsibility even for their own misconduct, the Railway and Canal Traffic Act (a) was passed to prevent them from imposing on the public unreasonable and improper conditions. Under this Act (which is extended to the steam vessels used by railway companies for their through traffic and the traffic carried on thereby, so far as its provisions are applicable to them (b)), railway and canal companies are liable for the loss of or injury done to horses, cattle, or other animals, or to articles, goods, or things, by their fault in receiving (c), forwarding, and delivering them, notwithstanding any notice, condition, or declaration by the company contrary to or limiting their liability. But companies may make such conditions with respect to receiving, forwarding, and delivering such things as the Court before which any question relating thereto shall be tried, shall adjudge to be "just and reasonable." The Act limits the amount of damages to be recovered for the loss of or injury to animals, unless a declaration of their value, if higher than the sums limited, shall be made at the time of delivery, and a higher charge paid, as under the Carriers Act. Further, no special contract respecting the receiving, forwarding, or delivering animals, articles, goods, etc., is binding, unless signed by the person with whom it is made, or the person delivering them for carriage. This enactment is held to require conditions limiting the common law liability of carriers both to be just and reasonable, and to be embodied in a signed special contract (d). The reasonableness of conditions depends on the circumstances of each case; but a condition that the company shall not be liable for any damage or delay, however caused, has been held bad (e), except under "owner's risk notes," the consignee having a bona fide choice to have his goods carried at a higher rate in the ordinary way (f). Exemption by contract from damage of a specified kind, as by leakage or breakage, does not relieve from responsibility from such damage, when it is caused by the carrier's negligence (g). In the case of fish or such perishable goods, a condition that the company shall not be responsible for loss of market by delay, or for other loss or injury, unless caused by fault or negligence, has been held valid (h). The statute does not apply to traffic beyond the company's own lines (i).

245. Nature and Kinds of Cautionry.—Cautionry is an accessory obligation or engagement, as surety for another, that the principal obligant shall pay the debt or perform the act for which he has engaged, otherwise the cautioner shall pay the debt or fulfil the obligation (a). The design of the cautioner's interposition, however, is, 'according to the common law,' not to save the creditor from the necessity of demanding and enforcing payments from his debtor, but to insure him against loss if these measures should fail to procure satisfaction. When the creditor 'wished' to lay on the cautioner the burden of execution against the debtor, he 'took' him bound as joint obligant; the effect of which 'was, before the Mercantile Law Amendment Act,' to deprive the cautioner of the benefit of discussion (b).

The cautioner's engagement implies that he is bound for the whole debt (c); that 'though' the principal obligant is 'no longer, in the absence of special stipulation, to be' required to perform his engagement before the cautioner shall be compellable to answer (d), 'the creditor shall use all proper precautions to secure payment of the debt by him, as by retaining and making available securities, etc. (e)'; that satisfaction or extinction of the principal obligation shall discharge the cautioner; and that the cautioner, engaging at the request or for the benefit of the principal debtor, shall, if compelled to fulfil his engagement, have relief or indemnification against the principal (f).

(a) See 1 Stair, 17. § 3 et seq. 3 Ersk. Pr. 3. § 21. 3 Ersk. 3. § 61. 1 Bell's Com. 347.

(b) Discussion is abolished, unless specially stipulated, by 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, § 8, in obligations for payment of debt, but not in obligations ad factum præstandum. See below, § 252.

(c) Grant v. Strachan, 1721; M. 14,633; 1 Ill. 71. See above, § 52; below, § 255.

(f) In the application of terms, "Adpromissor" is a surety in addition to the original obligant; "Expromissor" is a new debtor substituted in place of the original debtor, who is thereby discharged.

246. A cautionary obligation is commonly an engagement of friendship, and gratuitous; and in an old case it was held pactum illicitum for the cautioner to stipulate for a valuable consideration (a). But this would probably be otherwise determined now, since the principles of insurance have come to be better understood (b), and it is a daily practice to engage for the credit of others, on commission.

(a) King v. Kerr, 1711; M. 9461; 1 Ill. 174. Formerly a consideration was necessary by the law of England; but that law is now assimilated to that of Scotland by 19 and 20 Vict. c. 97, § 3; 1 Smith's L. C. 330 sq. (292, 318, 10th ed.)

(b) See More's Stair, lxx. Ex p. Adney, Cowper, 460. See below, § 282.

247. Cautionry is Proper or Improper:—

Proper, where the engagement is avowedly as cautioner; Improper, where both cautioner and principal are bound as principals; in which case the rights of a cautioner are renounced as to the creditor, but reserved as to the principal debtor (a).

(a) 3 Ersk 3. § 61 in fin. Montgomery v. Brown, 1713; M. 3586; 1 Ill. 173.

248. Proof.—Cautionary obligations, correctly speaking, can be proved only by writing, duly executed according to the requisites of the statutes (a); or recognised as a privileged writ (b).

(a) Auchinleck v. Gordon, 1580; M. 12,382; 1 Ill. 173. Deuchar v. Brown, 1672; M. 12,386. Reid v. Proudfoot, 1758; M. 12,344. Crichton v. Syme, 1772; 5 B. Sup. 640; Hailes, 483. *Wallace v. By the law of England, the contract of surety is required to be in writing. See the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds. See § 249A, 282 (a). Church of England Assur. Co. v. Hodges, 1857; 19 D. 414. Chaplin v. Allan, 1842; 4 D. 616.

(b) Angus v. Coult, 1749; Elch. Cautioner, 18; M. 17,040. The case cited has not been regarded as well decided; 1 Ill. 174. Dickson on Evid. § 645. It scarcely bears, however, on the clause in the text, which stands in need of no authority.

249. Exceptions are admitted to the above rule. Thus, a writing of which the subscription is acknowledged is good evidence of cautionry (a). And an improbativ writing, or an oath on reference, will establish the obligation, where the creditor has, with the knowledge of the cautioner, proceeded in reliance on his engagement, and rei interventus has taken place (b).

Although parole proof will not, otherwise than as just mentioned, be admitted to establish cautionry for future furnishings (c), yet where the cautioner's engagement is an integral part of a contract competent to be proved by parole evidence, the same proof 'was till 1856' admitted of the cautionary obligation (d).

249A. 'In 1856 the Mercantile Law Amendment Act assimilated our law to that of England, founded on the Statute of Frauds (§ 4), and Lord Tenderden's Act (9 Geo. iv. c. 14). It enacts that "all guarantees, securities, or cautionary obligations made or granted by any person for any other person, and all representations and assurances as to the character, conduct, credit, ability, trade, or dealings, of any person, made or granted to the effect or for the purpose of enabling such person to obtain credit, money, goods, or postponement of payment of debt, or of any other obligation demandable from him, shall be in writing, and shall be subscribed by the person undertaking such guarantee, security, or cautionary obligation, or making such representations and assurances, or by some person duly authorised by him or them, otherwise the same shall have no effect" (a).

'Although the words of this enactment seem to go beyond the terms of the English statute, which have been held to make the memorandum in writing necessary only as evidence of the contract, not to constitute it (b), yet as the expressed purpose of the Legislature was to remedy the inconvenience felt by reason of the laws of Scotland being different from those of England and Ireland in some particulars of common occurrence in trade, it is difficult to hold that writing is made indispensable to the constitution of the contract of cautionry. This, however, is not a question of practical importance; and there is no room to doubt that in all cases the contract can be proved only by writing, which must in ordinary cases be probative or holograph: improbativ guarantees being effectual only in rei mercatoria or when followed (as they generally are) by rei interventus (c). An undertaking to give a guarantee when required is a good "cautionary obligation" in the sense of the Act (d).'

250. Construction and Extent.—A cautionary obligation offered conditionally is effectual only on compliance with the condition; as an offer to be cautioner for a composition to be paid to creditors, in which the consent of all concerned is an implied condition (a). So an obligation to be signed by several is not binding on those who sign first, unless all have signed; but if the signature of the others be not expressly or manifestly a condition, and a bank or creditor has been induced to rely on the names of those who have already subscribed, they will be bound (b).

Pringle*, 1858; 20 D. 465. Cf. B. L. Co. Bank v. Thomson, 1853; 15 D. 314. Craig v. Paton, 1865; 4 Macph. 192. The qualification in the latter part of the sentence is perhaps too strongly stated; as in general the creditor ought to see that he gets a valid obligation. See Prov. Assur. Co., cit. Hence judicial bonds of caution, where the charger has not such a duty laid upon him, are valid against the other cautioners, although one of the signatures should be forged. Simpson v. Fleming, 1860; 22 D. 679.

251. Cautionry as an accessory obligation may be less extensive than the principal obligation, as for a part only; but it cannot be more extensive, though it may be more strict (a). There must be a subsisting obligation against the principal, though not necessarily such as lawyers call perfect; a natural obligation, though it will not sustain action against the principal, may be made good against the cautioner (b). The cautioner is entitled in all other respects to plead every defence which the principal debtor has against the demand (c). The extinction of the principal discharges the accessory engagement (d). Cautionary obligations are very strictly interpreted, though not so literally as to evade the true and fair construction of the engagement (e). There must, at entering into the engagement, be perfect fairness of representation, so far as the creditor is concerned, otherwise the cautioner will be free (f). Where any precautionary stipulations are made or plainly implied, they must be strictly observed, otherwise the cautioner will be free (g).

‘But fraud of the debtor does not affect the liability of the cautioner to an innocent creditor (h). And the universal obligation to make disclosure which holds in contracts of insurance does not apply to guarantees. While the cautioner is entitled to know the real nature of the transaction and the extent of his liability, the creditor is not bound at his peril to volunteer information as to the principal debtor’s credit, or anything which is not part of the transaction itself, such even as that the obligation is in substitution for a previous guarantee by another, or that a new cash credit is to be applied (there being no actual agreement to that effect) to pay off an old debt to the bank (i). But a creditor may become bound to inquire into and inform his surety of circumstances in the debtor’s conduct, such as may reasonably create a suspicion of fraud, for wilful ignorance is equivalent to knowledge (k).’

These are cases in which the principal's obligation was invalid, and the decisions varied. Prof. Bell says (1 Ill. 177), that they “may be reconciled on the ground that, wherever the cautioner engages aware of the objection, he is barred personalit exceptione from the plea; when the bond has been negligently and ineffectually executed to bind the principal, and taken by the creditor, the cautioner will not be liable.” The English cases exclude the Statute of Frauds, § 4, where the surety's (?) liability is not accessory at all, but is intentionally undertaken as an independent obligation. 252. Discussion.—The benefit of discussion ("beneficium ordinis") is a corollary to the accessory nature of the engagement, the cautioner being 'by common law' entitled to insist that the creditor shall first call upon and (in law language) "discuss" the principal debtor, if the cautioner have not expressly or virtually dispensed with this right; and that he shall give the cautioner all the benefit and relief derived from the principal debtor's estate (a).

'But by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, when one is bound as cautioner for a principal debtor, it is not necessary for the creditor to whom such cautionary obligation is granted, "before calling on the cautioner for payment of the debt to which such cautionary obligation refers, to discuss or do diligence against the principal debtor, as now required by law; but it shall be competent to such creditor to proceed against the principal debtor and the said cautioner, or against either of them, and to use all action or diligence against both or either of them, which is competent according to the law of Scotland" (b). But the Act is not to "prevent any cautioner from stipulating in the instrument of caution that the creditor shall be bound, before proceeding against him, to discuss and do diligence against the principal debtor" (b).'

253. Discussion has been held to import not merely a demand of payment, but enforcement of it, by registered denunciation of the principal, and warrant to imprison, though actual imprisonment is not required (a); by poinding, or arrestment and forthcoming, of his moveables; or by adjudication of his heritable estate (b). But there is a tendency to relax this rule; and it is a sufficient answer to a demand for discussion, that the principal debtor is out of the kingdom, and has no estate or effects in it (c); or that he is bankrupt, and his estate sequestrated (d); or that the cautionary obligation is judicial, as in a suspension, or advocacy, or for loosing of arrestment (e); or that the cautioner is bound in a bill as cautioner (f); or that he is bound as co-principal, as in a bank-credit bond (g), 'or as in a mercantile guarantee (h); or similar primary obligation (i).'

254. The right of discussion entitles the cautioner to insist on the application by the creditor of all money of the debtor coming into his hand, and of all securities, direct and indirect, which he holds over the estate of the debtor, and which are not appropriated to other debts (a). But it has been held that a landlord having a cautioner bound for rent is not obliged to have recourse to the ruinous diligence of sequestration on his hypothec before coming on the cautioner; it being the chief use of the cautioner's obligation to avoid this necessity (b). The exercise of the right, however, may be stipulated by the cautioner, 'in which case the "exercise" of the right of hypothec implies that the sale of the effects must be carried out (c)'; and the cautioner may, on payment, demand an assignation to the hypothec (d).

(d) See below, § 270. M. Bell's Conv. 286.

255. Relief is a right on the part of the cautioner to indemnification against the principal debtor. It rests on two grounds: an equitable right to require the creditor to communicate the full benefit of his contract; and an obligation ex mandato of the principal debtor, for whose benefit the cautioner has engaged. By the former, the cautioner is entitled to an assignation of the debt and diligence (a); and, on satisfying the creditor, comes into his place, and may proceed as principal creditor (b). 'The cautioner is also entitled to the benefit of accessory securities held by the creditor, whether the surety knew of them or not (c). And any act of the creditor by which he voluntarily does away or even impairs such security, directly or indirectly, pro tanto liberates the cautioner (d). It is held that this rule applies to securities received by the creditor after the contract of cautionry (e). By the latter, he is entitled in his own person to take legal measures for his relief against threatened distress, or against the possible consequences of the failing condition of the principal debtor (b).

(a) I.e. if he makes payment in full; for payment of a dividend by the trustee of a sequestrated cautioner does not give this right. Ewart, supra, § 252 (b). But an assignation is not necessary to entitle a cautioner to sue for relief who has paid an overdue debt, against the payment of which the principal debtor has no defence. Craigie v. Graham, 1710; M. 14,649.

256. Discharge of Cautioner.—The cautioner may be discharged directly; or indirectly and consequentially.

257. (1.) By Direct Discharge, the cautioner may be freed while the principal debtor continues bound. 'So also by the expiry of seven years in cases to which the Septennial Limitation applies (infra, § 600 sqq.).'

258. (2.) By Satisfaction, or payment, or expiration, or extinction of the principal obligation, the cautioner is discharged as well as the principal (a).

259. (3.) By Change on Obligation.—The cautioner is freed by an essential change, consented to by the creditor without the knowledge (a) or assent of the cautioner, either on the principal obligation or transaction, or in respect to the person relied on (b); 'and that even though the original agreement may, notwithstanding such variance, be substantially carried out' (c). 'It is held in England that' when it is not self-evident, without inquiry, that the alteration is immaterial, and cannot prejudice the surety, the Court will not order an inquiry, the surety himself being in such a case the sole judge whether he will remain liable or not (d).

'The Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, affirming previous decisions, enacted that a guarantee or cautionary obligation to or for a firm should not be binding as to events occurring after a change in the constitution of the firm, unless a contrary intention appeared by express stipulation or by necessary implication from the nature of the firm or otherwise (e). The Partnership Act, 1890, adopts from the Indian Contract Act a shorter provision to a similar effect' (f).

(a) There is, however, no authority for saying that one who knows that the creditor is going to give time, or to do something which if done without his consent may discharge him, is bound to warn the creditor against it, and that by mere silence he is barred from afterwards pleading that he has been discharged. Per L. Blackburn in Polak v. Everett, 1 Q. B. D. 669; 45 L. J. Q. B. 369. Allan, B. Allan & Milne v. Pattison, 1893; 21 R. 195.

260. (4.) By Discharge of Debtor.—By the creditor discharging the principal debtor, or compounding the debt, without the cautioner's assent, the cautioner is freed (a); unless such discharge shall be so qualified as not to injure the cautioner's claim of relief (b). 'In a contract to give time to or release the debtor, a reservation of all the creditor's remedies against the surety has the effect of so qualifying the discharge, because it rebuts the presumption that a total discharge of the debt is intended, and it prevents the surety's rights against the principal debtor from being impaired, the debtor's consent that the creditor shall have recourse against the surety implying his consent that the surety shall in turn have recourse against him (c).'

261. To the above rule there is an exception in bankruptcy. When in England a commission of bankruptcy has been issued against the principal debtor, or in Scotland sequestration has been awarded, the creditor may, by acquiescence, allow the debtor to be discharged, or even, as a debitum justitie, concur in the discharge without freeing the cautioner (a): And the creditor 'might' agree to a composition in bankruptcy without discharging the cautioner, provided the cautioner 'had' been previously called on to satisfy the debt,—the creditor being entitled after such notice to take what he 'could' get (b). 'Now it is expressly provided by 19 and 20 Vict. c. 79, § 56, that no act of the creditor, in voting or drawing a dividend, or in assenting to a discharge of the bankrupt, or to a composition, discharges a co-obligant of the debtor; but he may obtain an assignation from the creditor, and take his place in the sequestration, if he prefers that course (c).'

261A. (5.) By Discharging a Co-Cautioner.—The Mercantile Law Amendment Act provides that "after the passing of this Act, where two or more parties shall become bound as cautioners for any debtor, any discharge granted by the creditor in such debt or obligation to any one of such cautioners, without the consent of the other cautioners, shall be deemed and taken to be a discharge granted to all the cautioners; but nothing herein contained shall be deemed to extend to the case of a cautioner (a) consenting to the discharge of a co-cautioner who may have become bankrupt" (b). This rule has been held not to apply to separate cautionary obligations for specific sums, though parts of the same debt (c). And in all such cases the distinction is to be observed between a total release or discharge of the cautioner's (or principal's) (d) obligation, and one which may be construed as merely an agreement by the creditor not to sue him, as when the creditor's rights and claims against the other obligants are reserved entire (e).'

was the intention of the statute to assimilate our law on this point to that of England, and if it be settled in England (Dering v. E. Winchelsea, 2 B. & P. 270; 1 Wh. & Tud. L. C. 106; 3 Ross' L. See, however, Ward v. Natl. Bank of New Zealand, 8 App. Ca. 755. See as to the construction of the guarantee in Morgan v. Smart,—a guarantee for a limited sum, part of a specific debt,—*Ellis v. 262. (6.) By giving Time.—The cautioner is not freed by the creditor merely forbearing or abstaining from enforcing payment, 'nor by a mere agreement not to sue, whereby the cautioner's recourse is not impaired (a)'; but he will be freed by the creditor agreeing 'by positive contract' to "give time" to the debtor beyond the limits of the original obligation, so as to tie up the cautioner, by virtue of that agreement, from having the same remedy he might otherwise have had (b). 'In a course of mercantile dealing under guarantee the usual or stipulated period of credit is looked to, and the taking of bills in the ordinary course of trade is not per se a giving of time such as to liberate a cautioner (c). Under a continuing guarantee (§ 284, infra) a cautioner may no doubt be discharged by express agreement for "giving time"; but the mere sale of goods at unusual and unreasonable periods of credit affords a defence to the cautioner rather on the ground that the transaction is not within the terms of his obligation, and the question to be determined is whether there has been a material deviation from the contract (d).'

263. (7.) By Neglect of Creditor.—The cautioner is freed by the creditor's extreme neglect of legal proceedings against the principal obligant (a), especially if such proceedings have been already begun against the estate of the principal (b); or by omission to complete or to take advantage of a security in competition (c); or by undue neglect in negotiating a bill (d); 'or by breach of a term in the contract of cautionry, as when one had agreed to see a debt paid by instalments, and on the debtor's failure to pay the first instalment, the creditor, without notice to the cautioner, took proceedings on a bill for the full sum, and thus materially changed the debtor's position (e).' But mere delay to institute proceedings will not, in the common case, liberate the cautioner; nor the discontinuance of personal diligence commenced against the principal debtor; nor delay or forbearance in enforcing a right of hypothec against a tenant (f).

264. (8.) By giving up Funds, etc.—The cautioner is freed by the creditor giving up funds over which he has a right of retention (a); or renouncing any security over the debtor's estate without the cautioner's consent (b); or neglecting to claim on an estate on which the cautioner was entitled to rely (c).

265. (9.) By Liberation of Debtor.—When the creditor has imprisoned or apprehended the debtor, it does not seem to invalidate his claim against the cautioner that he has afterwards liberated the debtor (a). The cautioner will still be liable to the creditor, although the debtor shall have escaped from prison; but he will not be liable to the magistrates, on their paying the debt to the creditor; on the contrary, they must indemnify him if he should be called on (b).

(a) M'Millan v. Hamilton, 1729; M. 3390; 1 Ill. 196. Graham v. Little, 1730; M. 3364. The words "imprisoned or" appear to have crept in per incuriam, as they are not supported by the cases cited, and are contrary both to 3 Ersk. 3. § 66, and 1 Bell's Com. 359. See also above, § 263.

266. Recall of Cautionry.—Cautionary obligations may be recalled in certain cases (a); as, where one engages for a cash credit, he may, by giving notice to the bank, stop further advances on his responsibility. So, a cautioner for a bank agent, trustee, factor loco tutoris, etc., may put an end to his responsibility on reasonable notice, and proper measures taken for recalling the power delegated on his credit (b); but a cautioner for an absolute obligation cannot withdraw without taking the debtor in his own hand; nor can a cautioner for a certain term of years (as in a lease) withdraw his security (c). 'The cautioner's death generally puts an end to the liability of his estate for the future, if notified to the creditor by his executor, at all events in cases in which the deceased had himself power to recall (d).'

267. Division.—Although co-cautioners are each ultimately liable to the creditor for the whole debt, they are, in the first instance, entitled to the benefit of Division, provided they have not expressly renounced that benefit. By this each is liable only for his own proportion, while the other cautioners are solvent; and parole evidence, or circumstantial proof, is competent to one co-obligant against another, to prove that he is only a cautioner (a).

(a) 3 Ersk. 3. § 63. Drummond v. Nicolson's Crs., 1697; M. 12,329; 1 Ill. 196. Smollet v. Bell, 1793; M. 12,354. See M'Phersons v. Haggart, 1881; 9 R. 306. The law of Scotland as to this is made that of England by 19 and 20 Vict. c. 97, § 5.

268. In the Roman law, the obligation of co-cautioners was undertaken by the "stipulatio," in which each answered or engaged for the whole debt. The consequence was, that each was liable, singuli in solidum; and that there was not in law any obligation or ground of action to the several cautioners against each other, but on any one of them paying the debt it was extinguished, and all the rest of the cautioners discharged. Two remedies in equity were afterwards introduced: the Beneficium Divisionis, by which any one might insist on the others being called on to pay their share; and the Beneficium Cedendarum Actionum, by which any one cautioner, on paying the debt, was entitled to require the creditor to assign his right to him (a). This is not necessary with us; and on that ground it was once held that an assignation could not be demanded (b). But it is now settled that an assignation may be demanded (c).

269. Relief among Co-Cautioners.—The relief or remedy arising to co-cautioners inter se, cannot be impaired or discharged by the creditor without discharging the co-cautioners (a).

270. But where any one of the co-cautioners seeks relief against the others, he must communicate the benefit of any deduction or "ease," which may have been allowed to him in paying the debt; and the benefit of any security which he may hold, 'without the knowledge and acquiescence of the co-cautioner (a),' over the estate of the principal (b). But this does not hold if the cautioners be bound each for a specific sum (c). Where a cautioner who holds a collateral security is creditor in other debts, he is not bound to renounce the benefit of his security (d); and a personal guarantee by a third party to any of the cautioners he is not bound to communicate (e).

(e) Coventry v. Hutchinson, 1830; 8 S. 924. See as to this section, 3 Ersk. Pr. 3. § 27, note in 16th ed.

271. Cautioners may be bound in the same or in several deeds; and at the same time, or at several times. The general rule is, that cautioners are entitled to mutual relief, whether their obligation be in one or in several deeds, being all bound for behoof of the debtor, and at his request (a).

(a) Walker v. Inglis, 1827; 5 S. 726; aff. 1830, 4 W. & S. 40; 1 Ill. 197. Finlayson v. Smith, 1827; 6 S. 264. Alston v. Dennistoun & Co., 1828; 7 S. 112. See *Clark & Highgate v. 272. But where cautioners are already bound, and new cautioners are introduced, it is held that if this be only at the desire of the debtor, and not of the former cautioners, the new cautioner is bound as if he had been originally a co-cautioner, and has no other relief than such a cautioner has: And if he be introduced at the request of the former cautioners, or with their assent or acquiescence, to relieve them from a demand, he is cautioner for them, and will have total relief against them (a).

Swinburne*, 14 Ves. 160; 1 Ill. 202; 9 R. R. 264; but it was rejected in the Court of Session—Lennox v. Campbell, May 18, 1815; F. C. It seems to be a question of intention—Walker v. Inglis, cit., § 271 (a); but in the absence of circumstances showing the contrary, the presumption is that the new cautioner interposed on behalf of the principal debtor. See Thorburn v. Howie, 1863; 1 Macph. 1169. Inglis v. Bethune, 1798; Hume, 87. M'Phersons v. Haggart, cit., § 267 (a).

273. Judicial Cautionry.—Cautionary obligations are employed in judicial proceedings, to secure the efficacy of jurisdiction; to relieve from arrestment or inhibition (a); to secure debts brought under suspension in the course of execution or diligence; to secure the person of the debtor for the purpose of personal execution by imprisonment when in meditatione fugæ, or when indulged by an incarcerating creditor with temporary liberation.

(a) See below, § 2282.

274. (1.) Caution judicio sisti.—This is caution to abide judgment within the jurisdiction of the Court. It is exacted from persons in meditatione fugæ; and the pursuer of a cessio bonorum may, on such caution, procure a personal protection or warrant of liberation (a). By the ordinary form of the bond, the cautioner undertakes that the defender shall appear to answer to any action to be brought within six months; and it has sometimes been held that this entitles the creditor to have the person of the defender produced in Court, open to personal diligence (b). But this is not the lawful effect of the bond; and it would appear that the cautioner would not be held to forfeit his bond if the debtor were pointed out within Scotland, although he were in prison, or had taken sanctuary, or procured a personal protection (c).

The creditor is not bound to call on the cautioner till the decree is about to be extracted (d); and he must allow him a reasonable time to present the debtor (e).

The obligation de judicio sisti is discharged, by death of the debtor (f); by notice to the creditor, with presentment of the debtor's person in Court (g); by presentment on the creditor's requisition; and by decree extracted, without requisition to present the debtor (h).

275. (2.) Caution judicatum solvi.—In proper maritime cases the defender was formerly bound to find caution de judicio sisti et judicatum solvi (a). But now it is incompetent for the Sheriff, in exercise of his Admiralty jurisdiction, to require such caution from any defender domiciled in Scotland; unless special grounds, stated in the interlocutor, shall make it necessary (b). 'And it is also abolished in maritime cases in the Court of Session (c).' The effect of this caution, 'which is still given in some cases, e.g. in a general loosing of arrestments (d),' is, that the cautioner is absolutely liable for all that shall be found due to the pursuer; that where caution is found in the Sheriff Court, he is not discharged by suspension presented to the Court of Session (e); that he is not relieved by decree of absolvitor, till such judgment shall be final; and that the death of the party is no liberation to the cautioner (f).

276. (3.) Caution in Suspension and Advocation.—This security to the creditor is given, in suspension (which is a stay or sist of diligence already in the course of execution), by caution for the principal sum in the charge, with expenses (a); in advocacy (which 'was' an appeal from an inferior judge to the Court of Session), the caution 'was' only for the expense in the inferior court, and in the Court of Session (b). The cautioner is not bound till his caution is accepted, and may, in the interim, withdraw on the debtor's insolvency (c). The cautioner's obligation, both in suspension and in advocacy, is not merely personal for the suspender or advocator; but is continued as surety for the heir on the death of the debtor (d).

277. (4.) Caution by Bond of Presentation is used when a creditor, having personal diligence ready to be executed, or his debtor actually apprehended or in prison, grants an indulgence, on condition of the debtor presenting himself at an appointed time as free as at the time of giving the indulgence; otherwise to pay the debt (a). The cautioner undertakes that the debtor shall be personally presented, at a particular place, and on a day and hour specified. The bond is satisfied, and the cautioner freed, by the debtor's death. He is freed for a time by the debtor's sickness, or by inevitable accident; provided the debtor be presented as soon as the impediment is removed. If the debtor be imprisoned by another creditor, it seems to be sufficient to give notice to the holder of the bond of his place of confinement (b). But it will not free the cautioner that the debtor is under protection or in sanctuary (c).

(a) It must be in writing. Chaplin v. Allan, 1842; 4 D. 616.

279. Letters of Credit and Recommendation.

—(1.) A Letter of Credit is a mandate authorising the person addressed to pay money, or furnish goods, to another, on the credit of the writer. When bought at a banker's, it constitutes a debt against the writer; and being a draft on the person addressed, it goes, when answered, into account between him and the writer, but raises no debt to the person paying against the payee. When given for accommodation, and without value paid, it raises, on being answered, a debt not only against the holder of the letter, who receives the money, but also against the writer ex mandato, in favour of the person addressed, who has paid the money. A person going abroad gets a power to draw on the writer's correspondent to a certain amount; or a trader, entering into a new line of trade, or settling in a new place, gets a letter of credit or recommendation to dealers in that market; and the chief difficulty is to distinguish between a letter pledging the writer's credit and a mere introduction, under which the person addressed is to follow his own discretion in giving credit (a).

(a) As to the law of letters of credit and circular notes, see Orr & Barber v. Union Bank, 1852; 14 D. 395; rev. 1854; 1 Macq. 513. *Cal. Ins. Co. v. B. L. 280. (2.) Letters of Recommendation. — Generally stated, where a Letter of Recommendation specifies a sum as the limit of credit to be allowed to the bearer; or when it applies specially to a transaction, or dealing, or course of dealing, in which credit is necessary, and is accompanied by an assurance of safety, it will be held as a guarantee. More particularly, the rules seem to be these:— When a representation is made as to character or credit, in consequence of and in answer to inquiries, the expressions used are to be construed largely in favour of the person making such representation, so as not, without great difficulty, to entrap him into a guarantee (a). But if the person making the representation states what he knows to be false, to the effect of inducing another to deal with the person recommended, he will be held liable as by a guarantee (b). A mere introduction, conceived in general terms of confidence or approbation of the character, conduct, and credit of the person as one with whom it is safe to deal, is held to be only recommendation, not superseding further inquiry or the exercise of a sound discretion; and not amounting to a guarantee (c). But when, instead of being thus limited, there is a distinct specific transaction mentioned, with an assurance that it may be safely entered into, it is more easily to be held a guarantee of that particular dealing (d).

A letter of recommendation covers only future dealings, unless the contrary be very clearly expressed (e).

281. (3.) Verbal Introductions 'followed' the same rules in general (a). But the greater readiness and confidence with which one speaks in conversation of a friend's situation and circumstances, not only has with us required such assurances to be much more express and specific than when expressed in writing; but this consideration has in England led to a statute, 'Lord Tenterden's Act,' whereby no action is maintainable by reason of any representation or assurance of credit, unless made in writing, and signed by the party to be charged therewith (b). 'And, as has been stated above (§ 249A), this rule has been extended to Scotland, so that no verbal introduction or representation can now be held a guarantee. All oral representations as to a third person's ability, etc., are within the Act, if they are made in order to procure money or credit for that third person, whether they are fraudulent or not; and no action will lie, even when they are fraudulently made for the purposes of the person making them, as that the money obtained may be applied to the liquidation of a debt due to the person making them (c).'

282. Mercantile Guarantees.—Guarantees, used in mercantile transactions, are either applicable to a special future transaction; or prospectively to a specific course of dealing. If intended to cover previous dealings, it must be clearly expressed. A guarantee 'must now' be in writing; 'although formerly it might' be by parole, provided it 'were' followed by rei interventus, without which it 'was' not conclusively binding (a). 'It is sometimes a difficult question whether an undertaking is a guarantee requiring to be proved by writing, or a primary obligation capable of proof by parole. If one says, "Do this, or give these goods to A, and I will see you paid," he himself gives the order and is the principal debtor; secus, when he says, "If A does not pay you, I will." It is a question of fact, and if A or the original debtor continues liable, there is a guarantee or cautionary obligation (b). There can be no suretyship unless there be a principal debtor (c).' It is not unlawful, nor unfrequent in practice, to allow a commission or percentage for engaging in such a guarantee (d).

So, when one induces another to enter into an engagement by a promise to indemnify him, that is not an agreement within the Statute of Frauds in England, and needs not be in writing. Thomas v. 283. These engagements may be either Permanent and Continuing guarantees; or Limited by stipulation, in respect of the transaction, of the person, or of the time; 'or del credere guarantees.'

284. (1.) Continuing Guarantees.—One engaging for "any" dealing of another, trusts entirely to his discretion, and will be liable to any amount of his dealings. Even when such a guarantee is limited to a certain sum, it is binding not for one dealing to that amount only, but for successive dealings (a). But where such expressions are accompanied by any clear indications that a particular transaction only is in contemplation, it will be held as limited, and not as a continuing guarantee (b). A bank-credit bond is of the nature of a continuing guarantee, being for all sums to be advanced or engaged for till the credit be recalled; and a letter guaranteeing an over-draft on the credit was held to be on the same footing (c).

285. (2.) Limited Guarantees.—The rule of construction of all such engagements, and of their limitation is very rigid. Being strictissimi juris, a limitation to future dealings is presumed; and unless the terms are such as to include existing debts, it will not cover them (a). A limitation to a particular transaction is conclusive (b); a limitation to a person is strictly to be observed (c); and a limitation in time is neither to be extended nor abridged (d). But the usage of trade will be held as qualifying the construction (e). A guarantee for a certain amount of goods has been held not to restrict the dealing, but to cover it to that amount (f).

286. (3.) Del Credere Guarantee.—This is an engagement by a 'mercantile' factor, bank agent, insurance broker, or other mandatary, for the solvency of persons who purchase from or deal with him in the concerns of his principal (a). The consideration for such an engagement is an additional allowance by higher commission on the transaction. This guarantee is constituted by express agreement; or by accepting of, or charging, or acquiescing in del credere commission. The factor is entitled to his commission immediately on the sale; the event being collateral (b).

(a) Grove v. Dubois, 1 T. R. 112; 1 Ill. 215. Bize v. Dickson, 1 T. R. 285 (both overruled. Barber v. Pott, 4 H. & N. 759; 28 L. J. Ex. 381. Morris, infra). *Mackenzie v. The contract does not fall under the Statute of Frauds in England, and therefore need not be in writing. Le Couturier v. Hastie, 8 Ex. 40; in H. L. 25 L. J. Ex. 253. Wickham v. Wickham, 2 Kay & J. 476. And on similar principles, viz. that it is primarily a contract of mandate, and only incidentally one of cautionary, it would seem not to come within the Merc. Law Amt. Act, § 8. The liability of a del credere agent is conditional on the vendee's failure to pay. Morris v. Cleasby, 4 M. & S. 566.

(b) See § 246, 282.

287. Cautionary Obligations for Officers generally.—Cautionary Obligations are most commonly made use of for securing a precise and subsisting debt; but they are also applied most usefully in many situations of trust, where the engagements and transactions are prospective. In such prospective engagement, while the cautioner is not exposed to the danger of any situation or transaction not fairly in contemplation of the parties at entering into the contract, he is not entitled to withdraw suddenly, and without due notice (a).

(a) As to the right to withdraw, see Burgess v. Eve and Phillips v. Foxall, cited below, § 288, and above, § 266.

288. From the nature of a prospective engagement, there are some situations in which a duty of care and vigilance is incumbent on the creditor for protection of the cautioner, as in the care to be taken of an apprentice (a). 'But as the purpose of a guarantee of this kind is to protect against dishonesty and misconduct, it is no answer to a claim upon the bond that the employer did not see that the employee did his duty. And the obligor (unless where periodical accounting is made the basis of the contract, and its omission a ground of irritancy or forfeiture) is not discharged even by long neglect in the nature of passive inactivity to demand payment or accounting. To liberate the surety from future liability, there must be a positive act by the employer to his prejudice, such as deliberate continuance of the employment, without notice to the surety, after discovery of dishonesty or gross misconduct, failure to disclose previous discreditable conduct, or such negligence as amounts to connivance or fraud (b). Sureties are not discharged if the creditor does something to change their position in consequence of a fraudulent act of the person for whom they are bound (c).' And when the cautioner happens to die during the time contemplated (d), the cautionary obligation is continued on the heir, not only for the debt incurred during the original cautioner's life, but prospectively for the intromissions or advances after the heir's succession (e). 'The obligation ceases on a change of firm, and on the death of the creditor (f).'

In Shaw's Bell's Commentaries, p. 28 (below, § 294), the doctrine is limited to the case where the cautioner "binds himself and his heirs"; but this seems to be incorrect, as "it is a general rule of the law of Scotland that all obligations incurred by the ancestor transmit against his representatives." By the whole Court in Kerr v. Bremner, cit. Bell's Com. i. 367, 369 (385, 387, M'L's ed.). Bell's Conv. 256.

289. An important point in all such prospective obligations by cautioners is, the extent of the obligation. It is an absolute condition implied in the cautioner's engagement, that the creditor shall deal fairly with him, and not mislead him into any engagement for deficiencies undisclosed (a). And there must also be perfect fairness in the cautioner's engagement (b).

The ordinary obligation is for future intromissions, the principal being trusted on the faith of the cautioner: But it may be otherwise stipulated; and it is to be remarked particularly whether the words are so broad as to extend to past as well as to future dealings, or acts of administration (c).

Where the obligation of the cautioner is general and unlimited, for all loss by the acts of the principal debtor, declaring that the cautioner shall not be liable in more than a certain sum, the cautionary obligation is held to be a covering security, entitling the creditor to apply to all his other resources before coming on the cautioner (d). It seems to be different where the intromissions themselves are limited in amount (e).

The cautionary obligation for intromissions under a particular employment, lease, etc., is confined to the particular extent and character of intromissions under that collateral contract, 'or bargained in the cautionary writing (f).

Any material change in the nature of the employee's duties and responsibilities, such as to effect the peril of the surety, or vary the conditions of the contract made with the surety, and not communicated to him, liberates him (g).

290. Particular Officers.—(1.) Cautioner for a Bank Agent.—In order to be secured against the fraud, malversation, or negligence of their agents, and generally for their agent's intromissions, banks take one or more sureties, bound either without limitation, or for a particular sum.

291. This being a prospective and continuing guarantee, the bank and the cautioners are reciprocally bound in duties to each other: the cautioners directly, for solvency, fidelity, and care; the bank directly, for perfect fairness in the contract (a), and indirectly, for due vigilance in that superintendence which the nature of the trust prevents the cautioner from assuming (b).

(a) Smith v. Bank of Scotland, 1813; 1 Dow, 272; cit. § 289 (a).

Welsh*, 1829; 7 S. 732. Thistle Friendly Society of Aberdeen v. Garden, 1834; 12 S. 745. The bond sometimes excludes or limits the bank's duty in superintending, etc.; but a bond of this kind cannot be construed as a security for advances made with the bank's knowledge upon the agent's personal account. North of Sc. Bkg. Co. v. Fleming, 1882; 10 R. 217.

292. Where the cautionry is without restriction, the debt of the principal is the debt against the cautioner. Where the sum is restricted, but the obligation not limited, it is a covering security, and the creditor may apply all the debtor's resources, in the first place, before making his demand (a).

(a) Maxton and Borthwick, supra, § 289 (d).

293. It is commonly covenanted that the amount of the debt against the cautioner shall be fixed by a stated account, signed by the accountant 'of the bank,' and this is sufficient to fix the sum for which summary diligence may proceed (a).

(a) Fisher v. Stewart (Perth Bank), 1824; 2 S. 583, and 3 S. 426; 1 Ill. 219. See s. c. 7 S. 97; and below, § 302.

294. If heirs are bound, the obligation transmits ipso jure, as a continuing guarantee, against the heir, on the death of the original cautioner (a).

(a) See above, § 288 (d).

295. (2.) Cautioner for a Trustee or other Official Person.—This proceeds on the principles already explained: Where the trustee is under the Sequestration Act, there are certain duties prescribed, the palpable breach of which the creditors have it in their power to check; and neglect of fair superintendence in this respect was in one case held to bar the demand against the cautioner (a). But this has been disapproved of, and the creditors held entitled both to the protection of the provisions of the statute on the one hand, and to the full benefit of the cautionary obligation on the other, undischarged by any actual or presumed neglect on the part of the creditors, or of the committee of their number (b). In one case, in the sequestration of a land estate, where the creditors had not bestowed due vigilance in checking the intromissions of a judicial factor, it was held that the cautioner was freed (c). But the more recent case of M'Taggart (b) is against that decision; and in cases of extrajudicial trusts, this was not held a good defence to the cautioner (d). Where, in a private trust, the cautioner prescribes the rules of vigilance or of accounting, and these are neglected, the cautioner is free (e).

296. (3.) Caution for a Messenger-at-Arms.

—For the due execution of his duty, a messenger finds caution in the Court of the Lord Lyon, "for the damage, interest, and expense which the lieges shall sustain through the negligence, fraudulent or informal execution, of the messenger" (a).

(a) 1587, c. 46. Form of the bond in Lyon Office.

297. This gives action not only to the employer of the messenger, but to any person suffering oppression or damage by his illegal proceedings as a messenger (a); not when he acts, or is employed to act as an agent. It gives action also to the Lord Lyon for his fees (b). The responsibility of the cautioner is confined to the messenger's acts in that character alone (c); and in point of extent, where a special act of diligence is to be done (as to poind a cargo or arrest a debt), the cautioner will be liable only for what is lost by the messenger's failure in duty; but where he is employed generally to do diligence for recovery of debt, the cautioner is not allowed to go into an inquiry as to the probable inefficacy of the diligence, the law holding the debt to be the measure of the damage (d). 'The surety is liable for the expenses of proceedings caused by his negligence, although no notice of these proceedings was given to him; but of course may examine into and question the necessity and propriety of these proceedings (e).'

298. (4.) Caution for a Notary.—Such cautioner engages for the notary's "honest and faithful administration of his office conform to law" (a). Not only fraud, but also want of skill in the proper office of notary, will subject the cautioners (b). But the cautioner is not liable for what is not strictly the business of a notary (c). 'Since 1873, it is not necessary to find caution on admission as a notary (d).'

299. Cautionary Obligation for a Cash Account.—A cash account with a bank is a credit allowed to a person named, in virtue of which he may pass cheques on the bank, draw bills, and operate in all the various ways in which he might have operated if he had actually had money deposited in the bank (a). The loan is made as the money may be required. The repayment is by the replacing of money as funds come in. The debt is in perpetual fluctuation. The credit and loan are secured by a bond for such amount of debt, not exceeding a certain limited sum (b), as shall ultimately arise on a balance of the deposits and drafts.

(a) See above, § 284. See as to the effect of a change of partners, supra, § 259.

(b) As to the effect of this limitation, see 1 Bell's Com. 366-367 (384, M'L's ed.); and comp. above, § 289 (d), (e); § 285 (f).

300. This engagement is undertaken by a bond (a), in which the account and all the operations on the credit are stipulated to be in the name of the person for whose benefit the credit is provided; but he and his cautioners are all bound jointly and severally as principals (b); the cautioners expressly renouncing the benefit of discussion.

(a) This may be by heritable bond; 19 and 20 Vict. c. 91, § 7; below, § 913. M. Bell's Conv. 1162. The bank may withdraw the credit, although they have got a heritable security. Johnstone v. Coml. Bank, 1858; 20 D. 790.

(b) See as to the liability of the cautioner's heirs, ante, § 288, 294. Cases of Morrice and B. L. Co. and Cal. Banking Co.

301. A cautioner interposing in a bank credit already granted will be liable for sums advanced before as well as after the date of this bond, provided there be a fair disclosure of the state of the account, or a distinct stipulation as to past advances. 'But the creditor in such a bond is not bound to disclose the particular application to be made of the money to be advanced, even though it should be intended and applied to pay off an existing credit; for the cautioner interposing for his friend is bound to know his condition (a). But if there be misrepresentation or active concealment of a state of matters or application of the money different from what might be expected as in the ordinary course of business, the cautioner will be free (b).'

(b) Falconer v. N. of Sc. Bkg. Co., 1863; 1 Macph. 177, 704.

302. It is in such bonds stipulated that, to the effect of authorising a valid charge, the amount of the debt shall be ascertained by a signed account extracted from the bank books. 'According to the practice in keeping such accounts, a balance is struck at the end of each year, when interest is added to the principal, just as if a draft had been made upon the bank, to the effect of extinguishing the cautioner's obligation for interest on previous drafts thus converted into principal, and entitling the bank to interest on the accumulated sum, within the limit of the bond, from the date of each balance (a).' The amount so ascertained will be sufficient to authorise summary execution (b); but the account so referred to is not to be held conclusive between the parties (c); the banker will only thereby have the benefit of caution in a suspension, should any objection be stated against the charge.

303. In balancing the account, all sums due to the bank, or which the bank shall engage for on account of the person in whose name the account is kept, by orders, drafts, receipts, letters of credit, and bills accepted, indorsed, or discounted, or in any other manner of way, will be included. And although, in the account on which the charge is given, some of those engagements should still be depending on bills in the circle, the result as they afterwards fall 'due' may be brought to augment the balance (a).

(a) See above, § 256 et seq. As to giving time, transacting, etc., see Cal. Bkg. Co., and cases in § 262.

305. Nature of Bills.—Bills are to be viewed not only as obligations of simple form and ready execution, but as part of the circulating medium of the country, by means of which manufacturers and merchants turn credit into a negotiable shape, and are enabled to proceed with their dealings as if paid in cash for their goods, while the buyer is indulged with a delay of payment till the returns of trade fill his hands (a).

Bills and Notes (b) are properly mercantile instruments; but the use of them has not with us, as in some countries, been restricted to mercantile men, and they have been largely introduced into the ordinary intercourse of life. In that use of them the same rules are applied as in the strict mercantile employment of the instruments.

(a) The subject is so extensive, and the adjudged cases so numerous, that it may be sufficient here to lay down the general principles which regulate the doctrine: referring to the institutional writers who have fully treated the matter. See Bayley on Bills. Chitty on Bills. Wilson's Thomson on Bills. 1 Bell's Com. 386. Selwyn's Nisi Prius. 3 Kent, Com. on American Law, 71. Pothier, Cont. de Change. Code de Commerce, liv. i. tit. 8. 1 Pardessus, Droit Com. 327. Merlin, Répert. de Jurisp. tom. vii. p. 395. Van Leeuwen, 437. Byles, Chitty, Parsons, and Story on Bills. Story on Promissory Notes.

(b) The term Bills will be hereafter used as including Notes, in so far as appropriate.

306. Kinds and Forms of Bills.—(1.) A Bill of Exchange is 'an unconditional order in writing, addressed by one person (drawer) to another, signed by the person giving it, requiring the person to whom it is addressed (drawee) to pay on demand, or at a fixed or determinable future time, a sum certain in money to, or to the order of, a specified person, or to bearer. An instrument which does not comply with these conditions, or which orders any act to be done in addition to the payment of money, is not a bill of exchange. A bill is not invalid by reason that it is not dated; that it does not specify the value given, or that any value has been given therefor; or that it does not specify the place where it is drawn, or the place where it is payable (a).' The subscription of the drawee to the address of this letter is the "acceptance" of the order, or the undertaking to pay the money as ordered; and such acceptance completes the obligation.

Foreign Bills of Exchange, properly so called, to which there are three parties,—drawer, drawee, and payee,—are used in transmitting money from one country to another. They are generally drawn in sets or duplicates, each being drawn conditionally, "the others not being paid"; and the payee is furnished with two or three duplicates, to provide for the accidental loss of one or more. These the drawee is to answer only alternatively: The first presented is entitled to payment; the discharged document being a good answer to a demand on the others. A banker, consequently, in discounting a draft which is one of a set, proceeds on the discounters' credit alone, unless all the set is given up, or indemnity taken against the use of those which do not appear.

(a) 45 and 46 Vict. c. 61, § 3 (1), (2), (4). (Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, referred to in this chapter as The Act.)

307. (2.) Inland Bills, in which also there may be three parties, but sometimes only two,—the drawer, requesting the money to be paid to himself, or his order; and the drawee, to whom the request is addressed,—are generally used for settling and constituting a debt in such a form, that the bill may either remain with the original creditor, ready for immediate execution at the time of payment; or be conveyed to another in place of money. 'An inland bill is, or on the face of it purports to be, both drawn and payable within the British Islands, or drawn within the British Islands upon some person resident therein. Unless the contrary appear on the face of the bill, the holder may treat it as an inland bill (a).'

(3.) A Promissory Note proceeds from the debtor, is signed by him alone, and contains, in form, an 'unconditional' promise or engagement to pay at a 'fixed or determinable future time,' to the creditor, or to his order, 'or to bearer,' a certain sum (b) 'in money. A note payable to maker's order is not a promissory note, unless and until it is indorsed by the maker (c). A note is not invalid by reason only that it contains also a pledge of collateral security, with authority to sell or dispose thereof (d).'

Promissory notes are the nearest in nature and use to inland bills; being a mere acknowledgment of debt, and engagement to pay to the original creditor; and capable, like the others, of being transferred as money to another person.

The obligation, in any of these terms, completed by the acceptance of the drawee of the bill, or by the subscription of the maker of the note, is transmissible by indorsement, 'i.e. indorsement completed by delivery'; which is either an order on the back of the instrument, signed by the payee, and directing the 'whole' amount to be paid to a person named; or the subscription of the payee's name on the back without any such order, which is called a blank indorsation, and is an authority to the holder of the instrument to demand payment of it when due (e).

(a) Act, § 4. See ib. § 83 (4), § 72 (2). This is nearly the same as 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, § 12 (Merc. Law Amendment Act, Scotland, which is repealed—see sched.), and § 97 (3) repeats the saving of the existing stamp laws. As to promissory notes, see the Act, § 83 (4).

(b) An acknowledgment of the receipt of money, accompanied by a promise to pay it when required, is a note under the Stamp Acts. See below, § 328. Vallance v. Forbes, 1879; 6 R. 1099.

(e) See below, § 329. The Act, § 2, 32, etc.

308. (4.) Bank Cheques.—Besides bills and notes, there is another form of order to transfer money, viz. Bank Cheques (a). These are orders addressed to a banker to pay a certain sum to the bearer of the cheque. 'It is negotiable, being defined "a bill of exchange drawn on a banker payable on demand," and the provisions of the law as to bills payable on demand, except in regard to summary diligence, apply to cheques (b). An indorsee or holder in due course (c), therefore (not one who holds merely as an agent for the payee or indorsee) (d), has an indefeasible title to it, though it may have been obtained from the drawer by fraud to which he was not a party (e). A banker is bound to pay his customer's cheques if he has sufficient funds in his hands, and is answerable to him in damages for loss caused by his wrongful refusal (f); and no pretext for refusal will be allowed short of a legal right of retention, or some equally good objection, such as arrestment (g), countermand of payment, or notice of the customer's death (h), or the customer's sequestration or notour bankruptcy.' There is no day of payment, the order being general; and the presumption of knowledge of dishonour applicable to ordinary bills taken by an indorsee after the day of payment (i) is not held to apply to one receiving a cheque after its date; though that may be a circumstance to weigh with the jury in evidence (k). 'If the holder of a cheque does not present it for payment within a reasonable time after its issue (which is a question of fact to be determined with regard to the nature of the instrument, usage, and the circumstances of the case), the drawer, if he had funds to meet it at the time when such presentment should have been made, is discharged to the extent to which he suffers damage by the delay, e.g. by the failure of the banker; and to the extent of such damage the holder of the cheque is made a creditor of the banker in lieu of him (l). If there be no loss, a cheque is, it has been said, valid for six years (m). Such instruments 'were' exempt from the stamp laws, if truly dated and drawn payable to the bearer on demand, and upon a banker within ten miles (n); 'but all cheques are now subject to a stamp duty of one penny (o). By 16 and 17 Vict. c. 59, § 19, bankers are authorised to pay to the bearer the amount of any cheque drawn on them payable to order purporting to be indorsed by the payee, and it is not incumbent on them (paying in good faith and in the ordinary course of business) to prove that the indorsement, or any subsequent indorsement, was made by or by the direction of the payee. But a third party cashing such a cheque is not protected by the statute (p). And this provision is confirmed by the Bills Act of 1882, which adds that a banker so paying is deemed to have paid in due course, though the indorsement has been forged or made without authority (q).

'Crossed Cheques.—Formerly the crossing of a cheque, whether generally or specially, left the document negotiable, and was merely a direction to the drawee to pay only to a banker, or rather a caution that he must take care not to pay to any but a banker (r). Subsequently statutes now repealed were passed to regulate such documents (s); and now by the Bills of Exchange Act, a cheque may be crossed by the drawer, or by a holder, or, again, to his agent for collection or to himself by the banker to whom it has been crossed, and either (1) generally, or (2) specially, or (3) with the words "not negotiable." In the first case the drawee is directed to pay only to a banker; in the second only to the banker to whom it is crossed, or to his agent for collection; and in the third only to a banker, or the banker indicated, as the case may be (t). The crossing is a material part of the cheque, and may not be obliterated, added to, or altered, except as authorised in the Act (u). The drawee must refuse payment of a cheque crossed to more than one banker, except when one is an agent for collection. A drawee paying in contravention or disregard of the crossing, is liable to the true owner for any loss through such payment, unless the cheque at presentment does not appear to be crossed, or to have had a crossing which is obliterated, or added to, or altered, and the drawee pay the cheque in good faith and without negligence (v). A banker paying according to the crossing in good faith and without negligence, and—when the cheque comes into the hands of the payee—also the drawer, are in the same position and have the same rights as if the cheque were paid to the true owner (w). One who takes a cheque crossed "not negotiable" has not, and cannot transfer, a better title than the person from whom he took it had (x). A banker who in good faith and without negligence receives payment for a customer of a crossed cheque, incurs thereby no liability to the true owner, if his customer prove to have no title or a defective title to the cheque (y).

309. Essentials of Bills.—The essentials of a bill or note are,—the engagement to pay; the person to whom payment is to be made, called the payee; the sum engaged for; 'but not' the time of payment, 'for if no time of payment is expressed, a bill is payable on demand (a)'; and the stamp (b). "When a bill is wanting in any material particular, the person in possession of it has a prima facie authority to fill up the omission in any way he thinks fit." In order that an instrument so completed may be enforceable against any person who became a party thereto before its completion, it must (besides being delivered (c)) be filled up within a reasonable time (which is a question of fact), and strictly in accordance with the authority given; but it is valid and effectual to all purposes, and without any such limitation, in the hands of one to whom it is negotiated in due course after such completion (d).'

(b) See below, § 328, and above, § 306.

(d) 45 and 46 Vict. c. 61, § 20. See below, § 313, 321 (g), and cases there cited.

310. The engagement is by acceptance of the order or request in a bill to pay; or by the words of promise in a note. Thus the engagement by note is at once perfect: the engagement by acceptance includes drawing and acceptance (a). 'A mere acknowledgment of debt is not a note, and a mere authority or request to pay is not a bill (b).'

310A. 'Capacity for Bills.—Capacity to incur liability as a party to a bill is coextensive with capacity to contract (a). The power of a corporation to make itself liable on a bill depends on the law in force for the time relating to corporations; so a trading corporation has such power, and other corporations have it only if it is given by their constitution or charter (b). If one of the parties has no capacity or power to incur liability on a bill, the holder may yet enforce it against any other party thereto (c).'

311. Drawing.—The drawing of a bill 'where the drawee has in his hands funds available for the payment thereof,' is a transference to the payee of the 'sum for which it is' drawn, 'or of any smaller sum due by the drawee to the drawer,' completed by presentment (a).

The bill must be drawn absolutely and unconditionally; but it is not in this sense held a condition if the 'foreign' bill be drawn in sets payable "if the others be not paid" (b). It is no bill if drawn with a condition; for that is contrary to the nature of a bill (c); but such a draft has been held to operate as an assignation intimated (d). 'An order to pay out of a particular fund is not unconditional in the sense of § 3 of the Act; but an unqualified order to pay, coupled with (1) an indication of a particular fund out of which the drawee is to reimburse himself, or of a particular account to be debited with the amount, or (2) a statement of the transaction which gives rise to the bill, is unconditional (e).

The payment must be in money, not in commodities (f), 'and the sum must be certain (g).'

The drawer must sign before producing the bill in judgment; but it is enough if his name be in the body of the bill, written by himself (h). Summary diligence will not, however, be given on such a bill (i).

The drawer must sign before any diligence can proceed on the instrument; but he may sign after the death of the acceptor (k). The drawer, by signing the bill, engages conditionally to pay it, should the drawee not accept or not pay; provided due notice be given to the drawer of the dishonour. 'See below, § 333E.'

312. Signing as Agent, etc.—The bill may be drawn, 'indorsed, or accepted,' for another, so as effectually to bind him, if he have by procuration or otherwise granted authority to that effect. But if the 'person so signing' is not careful to set forth 'that he signs for or on behalf of a principal, or in a' representative character, he will himself be liable (a); "but the mere addition to his signature of words describing him as an agent, or as filling a representative character, does not exempt him from personal liability" (b). In determining whether a bill is the bill of an agent signing it or of his principal, the construction most favourable to the validity of the bill is to be adopted (c). "A signature by procuration operates as notice that the agent has but a limited authority to sign, and the principal is only bound by such signature if the agent in so signing was acting within the actual limits of his authority" (d). The principal is not liable to the bill-holder, where the agent draws in his own name (e).

313. Acceptance 'is the signification by the drawee of his assent to the order of the drawer, and it' is indicated by the drawee signing his name to the address, or by adding to his subscription the word "ACCEPTS." Acceptance of a blank will entitle the holder to fill it up with any sum to which the stamp is applicable, so that it shall be effectual to any one acquiring right to the bill as an onerous indorsee (a). 'And it is now enacted that "where a simple signature on a blank stamped paper is delivered by the signer in order that it may be converted into a bill, it operates as a prima facie authority to fill it up as a complete bill for any amount the stamp will cover, using the signature for that of the drawer, or the acceptor, or an indorser"; but this is subject to the same limitation which applies to the completion of an imperfect bill by the possessor of it (b).'

314. Proper Acceptance.—To the proper and efficient purposes of a bill, and for summary execution, no other acceptance is available in Scotland but a written acceptance (a); and although a verbal acceptance may reasonably be thought sufficient, as by intimation of the draft, to complete a transfer by draft on the holder of the drawer's fund, this has been decided not to be sufficient in competition (b). Formerly it was held in England that a verbal acceptance was sufficient; but the law 'was put,' by statute, on the same footing as in Scotland (c). 'Afterwards the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, required the acceptance to be in writing, and signed by or for the acceptor; and this was, so late as 1878, held to mean that there must be not only a signature of the acceptor, but, contrary to the practice of merchants and others, written words of acceptance (d). An Act was immediately passed (41 and 42 Vict. c. 13) providing that an acceptance consisting merely of the signature of the acceptor should be sufficient; and the law is now that the acceptance is invalid unless written on the bill, and that the mere signature of the drawee without additional words is sufficient; but that it must not express that the drawee will perform his promise by any other means than the payment of money (e). Except a referee in case of need (f), or an acceptor for honour (below, § 322), no one can be a party to a bill as acceptor who is not a proper drawee or addressee (g); and a stranger to the bill who signs (for security or other purpose, in the nature of an aval) incurs no liability to the drawer or acceptor, but incurs the liabilities of an indorser to a subsequent holder in due course (h).

'Time of Acceptance.—A bill may be accepted when incomplete; or when overdue, or dishonoured by non-acceptance, or non-payment; and "when a bill payable after sight is dishonoured by non-acceptance, and the drawee subsequently accepts it, the holder, in the absence of any different agreement, is entitled to have the bill accepted as of the date of the first presentment to the drawee for acceptance" (i).'

315. Promise to accept.—To certain effects, however, something less than a written acceptance is admitted to bind the party, 'though not to make a bill.' Where one has made a written promise to accept a bill already drawn, on the faith of which money is advanced, this, although it will not make a negotiable instrument, or authorise summary execution as a proper acceptance, will, as an obligation, bind the drawee, and ground an action against him, by one taking the bill on the faith of it (a). But a promise to accept a draft not yet drawn has been held not binding, except to one induced to advance money on the promise; and even then this has been doubted (b). Where the drawee, having funds of the drawer in his hands, has had the draft presented to him while so indebted for money, he will be bound to answer it; and a protest for non-acceptance or non-payment will, even against competing creditors, be held equal to an assignation intimated (c).

316. 'General and Qualified Acceptances.—By the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, "an acceptance is either general or qualified. A general acceptance assents without qualification to the order of the drawer. A qualified acceptance in express terms varies the effect of the bill as drawn. In particular, an acceptance is qualified which is" (a)'

Conditional.—Acceptance may be conditional, although the drawing may not; for by the unconditional draft there is an absolute obligation saving the bill from that uncertainty which accords not with the nature of the instrument (b). Such an acceptance becomes absolute when the condition is fulfilled, 'but cannot be the ground of summary diligence.' The bill-holder (porteur) has his option to take a conditional 'or other qualified' acceptance, or to protest for non-acceptance, and take his recourse instantly against the drawer. "Where a qualified acceptance is taken" (except a partial acceptance of which due notice has been given), "and the drawer or an indorser has not expressly or impliedly authorised the holder to take a qualified acceptance, or does not subsequently assent thereto, such drawer or indorser is discharged from his liability on the bill." And a drawer or indorser receiving notice of a qualified acceptance, and not expressing his dissent to the holder within a reasonable time, is deemed to have assented to it (c). Every condition or variation on the acceptance must be in writing 'on the face of the bill, and in clear and unequivocal terms incorporated in the acceptance (d).'

(d) Meyer & Co. v. Decroix & Co., 1891; A. C. 520.

317. The necessity of making the acceptance conditional may arise from the circumstance of the drawee having, at the time the bill is presented to him, no funds of the drawer; and yet, expecting to be in possession of funds by the arrival of a ship with a consignment, or by a sale of goods in his hands, he may be willing to engage if such should be the case. So a condition of arrival or of sale will be good (a).

(a) 1 Stair, 11. § 7. See cases, Bayley, 178, 196. Thomson, 222. 1 Sel. 283.

318. Qualified Acceptance.—An acceptance in the character of cautioner is not in effect different from simple acceptance: it imposes no condition on the engagement, and is available only in settling the question of relief as between joint acceptors, or between drawer and acceptor (a). 'It has no effect against a third party taking the bill by indorsation (b).'

319. Partial Acceptance.—The acceptance may vary from the draft in amount, as for a part of the sum drawn for. But the drawer will not be liable in recourse for the balance, if such an acceptance be taken without protest 'as to the balance in the case of a foreign bill' and notice (a).

(a) Bayley, 199. 45 and 46 Vict. c. 61, § 19 (2) (b), § 44 (2).

320. Local Acceptance and qualified as to Time.—The acceptance may vary from the draft, in time, or in the mode or place, of payment. The rule is, that the place must be made exclusive by the words "and not elsewhere," in order to form a condition of the acceptance, and to make the bill payable only at that place; and that the change must be acquiesced in by the bill-holder (a). 'The acceptance of one or more of the drawees, but not of all, is also a qualified acceptance (b).'

320A. 'Effect of Acceptance.—The acceptor of a bill, by accepting it, (1) Engages that he will pay it according to the tenor of his acceptance; (2) Is precluded from denying to a holder in due course, a. the existence of the drawer, the genuineness of his signature, and his capacity and authority to draw the bill (a);

b. In the case of a bill payable to drawer's order, the then capacity of the drawer to indorse, but not the genuineness or validity of his indorsement; c. In the case of a bill payable to the order of a third person, the existence of the payee and his then capacity to indorse, but not the genuineness or validity of his indorsement (b).'

(a) London and S.-W. Bank v. Wentworth, 5 Ex. D. 96; 49 L. J. Ex. 657. The presumption (which may now, however, be redargued by parole) is that the acceptor is the principal debtor and the proper party to pay the bill. Catto, Thomson, & Co. v. Thomson & Son, 1867; 6 Macph. 54. See § 333B.

321. Acceptance by Procuration.—When one becomes a party to a bill or note by the subscription of his agent duly authorised, he is said to act by procuration. Such procuration is most regularly constituted by a written power of attorney, or letter of procuration; and, while unrecalled, or recalled without notice, the writer will be bound by the signature of his representative (a). Procuration may be proved by circumstances inferring acquiescence and implied authority; contrary to our former wholesome rule in Scotland, which required writing to confer such a power. This doctrine was established by a decision of the House of Lords, as conformable to the Mercantile Law of England (b). Every limitation of a power so extraordinary must be strictly observed. And although, in the case of a bill signed by the party himself, third persons are not bound to inquire into the making of the bill; yet, where the subscription bears to be by procuration, they must use due caution in taking the bill, by insisting for a sight of the procuration: they otherwise run the risk of the powers which it confers (c). There is in partnership an implied procuration in every partner, but limited to the trade of the company (d). 'In the Act of 1882, the word "person" is defined to include "a body of persons, whether incorporated or not," and "banker" to include "a body of persons, whether incorporated or not, who carry on the business of banking" (e). And it is provided that "where a person signs a bill in a trade or assumed name, he is liable thereon as if he had signed it in his own name," and that "the signature of the name of a firm is equivalent to the signature by the person so signing of the names of all persons liable as partners in that firm" (f). The signing of a blank or skeleton bill is a 'prima facie' authority to fill up any sum the holder chooses, to the extent which the stamp will cover (g).

322. Acceptance for Honour.—When a bill is presented to the drawee, and not accepted, it is said to be dishonoured; and may be returned on the drawer, or indorser, with a charge of interest, exchange, and costs. But one may be interested for the persons thus exposed to loss, so as to interpose in order to prevent the return of the bill and the accumulation of expense, by accepting for the honour of one or other of those whose names stand on the bill. Such an acceptance, 'which is made after protest for non-payment, before the bill is overdue, and with the holder's consent, was formerly required to' be made under protest before a notary and witnesses, the instrument, 'called an Act of Honour,' stating the fact, and being without delay sent to the person for whose honour it 'was' made. 'But now, in order to be valid, it must be written on the bill, and indicate that it is an acceptance for honour; and be signed by the acceptor for honour. Where it does not state for whose honour it is made, it is deemed to be for honour of the drawer. The maturity of a bill payable after sight is reckoned from the date of noting for non-acceptance (a).' It is an acceptance not absolute, but only provisional, that if the bill should not be returned dishonoured, but kept till maturity, and then not paid, the acceptor for honour will pay it. The acceptor for honour is entitled to demand from the bill-holder such proofs, at the maturity of the bill, as shall enable him to recover against the person for whose honour he has accepted; and so there must be 'due presentment, and' a formal protest taken by the bill-holder, 'and also notice to the acceptor for honour of the presentment and protest,' before the bill for the honour of the drawer is paid (b). 'The acceptor for honour is liable to the holder and to all parties to the bill subsequent to the party for whose honour he has accepted (c).' And in case of the acceptor for honour stipulating in his acceptance not merely a protest, but a refusal, 'it was required that' the bill 'should' be presented to the drawee, and refused by him (d). 'But now it must, as has just been said, be presented and protested for non-payment before being presented for payment to the acceptor for honour, and it must be presented to him not later than the day following maturity, if his address be in the place of protest for non-payment, or forwarded for presentment not later than that day, if elsewhere. The bill must be protested for non-payment, if dishonoured by the acceptor for honour (e).' The person so interposing has recourse against him for whom he has accepted, if already liable, and against all who are responsible to that person; but he has no claim against parties subsequent to him (f).

The bill-holder may refuse to take an acceptance for honour; but he does not seem entitled to refuse payment for honour.

'Payment for Honour.'—The Act states the law as to persons intervening to pay a bill supra protest for honour, when it has been protested for non-payment. Payment for honour must be attested by a notarial Act of Honour. It discharges all parties to the bill subsequent to the party for whose honour it is made, and the party paying succeeds to the holder's rights against that party and all liable to him. The holder refusing such payment loses recourse against all who would have been discharged by it (g).'

323. Subscription.—The subscription must be full. If made by initials or marks, it will not warrant summary execution; but in an action such documents are held admissible, on condition that it shall be proved to be the usual mode of subscribing, and to be genuine. These are points in the action to be made out by the pursuer (a). 'Where by the Act any instrument or writing is required to be signed by any person, it is not necessary that he should sign it with his own hand, but it is sufficient if his signature is written thereon by some other person by or under his authority; and in the case of a corporation it is enough if the document be sealed with the corporate seal, though the bill or note of a corporation is not required to be under seal (b). "No person is liable as drawer, indorser, or acceptor of a bill who has not signed it as such" (c).'

'Forged or Unauthorised Signatures.'—"Subject to the provisions of the Act, where a signature on a bill is forged or placed thereon without the authority of the person whose signature it purports to be, the forged or unauthorised signature is wholly inoperative, and no right to retain the bill, or to give a discharge therefor, or to enforce payment thereof, against any party thereto can be acquired through or under that signature, unless the party against whom it is sought to retain or enforce payment of the bill is precluded from setting up the forgery or want of authority. Provided that nothing in this section shall affect the ratification of an unauthorised signature not amounting to a forgery" (d).

'The provisions of the Act referred to are doubtless the estoppels declared against acceptors and indorsers in clauses 54 (2) and 55 (2) (see above, § 320A, and below, § 333E), and the provisions in favour of bankers in clauses 60, 80, and 82.

'As a forged signature (or a bill fraudulently altered) has no efficacy, one who pays such a bill has no remedy against the person whose signature has been forged (e). It was maintained, on the authority of a much discussed case (f), that a party to the bill paying it could recover, if that person had facilitated the forgery by his negligence, at least if it could be held that that negligence was the proximate cause of the loss. But it has been pointed out that the case cited, on whatever ground it was decided, was one between a banker and his customer, and depended on the law of mandate and the duties of a principal to his agent, and that there is no similar relation between the drawer or acceptor of a bill and all possible indorsers or holders. They are not under a duty to take precautions against possible forgeries after acceptance by minutely scrutinising the document, and taking care that there are no blank spaces that can be made available for fraudulent alterations. The natural protection against forgery is the criminal law, and not the vigilance of parties to exclude its possibility (g). Bankers, however, employed by a customer to pay his bill, are bound to pay to the proper payee, and to make sure of the genuineness of all previous indorsements (h), unless they (the bankers) have been misled in a material point by their principal (i). One who pays to a holder in bona fide cannot recover the money back on the ground that a prior indorsement was afterwards found to be forged, if such time has elapsed that the holder's position may have been changed (k).'

324. The Payee is either named in the bill or in the indorsement; or the bearer may be the person entitled to demand payment, as in bank notes. Uncertainty as to the payee 'in a bill not payable to bearer' is fatal to the bill (a). 'A bill may be drawn payable to or to the order of the drawer; or payable to or to the order of the drawee, e.g. a cheque on a banker in his own favour (b). Where a bill is not payable to bearer, the payee must be indicated therein with reasonable certainty (c). It may be payable to two or more payees jointly, or, contrary to the former law, alternatively to one of two, or one or some of several payees (d), or to the holder of an office for the time being (e). Where the payee is a fictitious or non-existing person, the bill may be treated as payable to bearer, and this although the payee really exists, but has never been intended by the (fraudulent) drawer to have any right upon the bill (f), or although the drawer, being deceived, believed him to be a real person (g).'

325. The Debt in a bill or note must be clear, and unquestionable, and pecuniary (a). 'The sum payable by a bill is certain in the meaning of the Act, although it is required to be paid with interest (b), by stated instalments (c), by stated instalments with a provision that on default in payment of any instalment the whole shall become due, or according to an indicated rate of exchange, or one to be ascertained as directed in the bill (d). In the event of discrepancy between the sum expressed in words and that in figures, that in words is the sum payable (e). When a bill is expressed to be payable with interest, interest runs, unless the bill otherwise provides, from the date of the bill, or if it be undated, from the issue thereof (f).' Bills granted for gaming debts are null in the hands of the original party (g), and were formerly held to be so even in the hands of an innocent indorsee as against the loser (h); but no such defence was held competent to a drawer or indorser discounting the bill and receiving money for it (i). By statute, the bill seems to be effectual in the hand of a bona fide indorsee; the granter or maker being entitled, on paying to him, to recover from the original payee as money paid on an illegal consideration.

326. Term of Payment and Days of Grace.

—The time of payment is important, as regulating the obligation and the effect of the instrument. It is either "on demand"; or "at sight"; or on a day certain "after sight or presentment"; or a day certain "after the date of the bill"; or at "usance," or "double usance," or "triple or half usance,"—usance being a period, differing according to local custom, for drawing bills from one country on another (a). 'Under the Bills of Exchange Act, bills payable on demand, or at sight, or on presentation, or in which no time for payment is expressed, are payable on demand. So bills accepted or indorsed when overdue are, as regards the acceptor or indorser, bills payable on demand (b). Bills are payable at a determinable future time in the sense of the Act, if they bear to be payable at a fixed period after date or sight, or at a fixed period after a specified certain event, though the time of its happening be uncertain (c). Any holder may insert the true date of issue or acceptance in a bill payable at a fixed period after date or sight (d). The date upon a bill, acceptance, or indorsement, is, in the absence of contrary proof, deemed to be its true date. And a bill is not invalid because ante-dated, post-dated, or dated on a Sunday (e).'

In reckoning time in bills of exchange, months are calendar, not lunar (f); weeks are computed by days, and days are reckoned with the exclusion of that on which the bill is dated (g), 'or from which the time of payment is to begin to run, and including the day of payment (h). Where a bill is payable at a fixed period after sight, the time begins to run from the date of acceptance, or of noting or protesting for non-acceptance or for non-delivery (i).'

327. In addition to the term specified, a certain indulgence is granted, called "days of grace." In all cases where the bill is drawn "at usance," or where the term of payment is definite, whether after date or after sight, days of grace are allowed (a). When the bill is payable "at sight," it 'was' unsettled whether there 'were' days of grace, though the weight of authority 'seemed' to be for the affirmative (b). It 'was' not settled in Scotland (c). 'But it is now enacted that bills or notes purporting to be payable at sight or on presentation shall bear the same stamp as, and shall for all purposes be deemed to be, bills or notes payable on demand (d).' When the bill is made payable "on demand," no days of grace are allowed. The days differ in different countries, but generally are reckoned exclusive of the day on which the bill becomes due. In Great Britain and Ireland three days of grace are allowed, exclusive of the day on which the bill falls due; and when the last day of grace falls on Sunday, 'Christmas day, or Good Friday,' or on a day 'appointed by royal proclamation as a public fast or thanksgiving day,' payment must be made on the preceding 'business' day (e). 'When the last day of grace is a bank holiday (other than Christmas day or Good Friday) under the Bank Holidays Act, 1871, or amending or extending Acts, or is a Sunday, and the second day of grace is a bank holiday, the bill is due and payable on the succeeding business day (f). As the bill is due and payable "on the last day of grace" (the Act, § 14 (1)), no action on it lies till the whole of that day has expired, although as soon as payment is refused, a right of recourse warranting protest and notice of dishonour immediately accrues to the holder (g).'

(e) In England, the rule by usage included Sunday and Christmas day; and by statute (39 and 40 Geo. III. c. 42) it was extended to Good Friday. To remove doubts, it was provided by 7 and 8 Geo. IV. c. 15 (not extending to Scotland), that Christmas, Good Friday, and all days appointed by proclamation for solemn fasts and thanksgiving, should in all such questions be treated and considered as Sunday.

England, under the Acts, are Easter Monday, Monday in Whitsun week, first Monday in August, the 26th December, or if that be a Sunday, the Monday following. In Scotland, New Year's day, Christmas day (or if they fall on Sundays, the following Mondays), Good Friday, the first Mondays of May and August. 34 and 35 Vict. c. 17. 38 and 39 Vict.

c. 13.

(g) The Act, § 14 (1), 47. Kennedy v. Thomas, 1894;

328. The Stamp.—This is regulated by Act of Parliament. Without a stamp of the proper, or higher, value and proper denomination, the bill or note is void (a); and the 'impressed' stamp cannot be supplied or altered, if not at first correct (b), 'except when the bill has been written on an impressed stamp of sufficient value, but improper denomination (c).' The sum for which the pro rata duty is leviable is that which is due at the date of the bill, not the amount as augmented by stipulated interest (d). No document which does not contain a promise to pay 'a certain sum' is a note under the Stamp Acts (e). 'An acknowledgment of the receipt of money, accompanied by a promise to pay it when required, is a note under the Stamp Acts (f).'

'It is obvious that the Stamp Acts require certain documents which are not negotiable documents to be stamped as bills of exchange or promissory notes. In other words, the definitions of such documents in the Bills of Exchange Act and the Stamp Act are not the same. In construing the latter Act, which makes promissory notes include "any document or writing (except a bank note) containing a promise to pay any sum of money," the Courts put a rational limitation upon the words, holding that they apply to documents which consist substantially of a promise to pay a definite sum of money, and nothing else. An agreement, therefore, which includes a promise to pay a certain sum combined with other stipulations, is not within the clauses of the Stamp Act as to bills and notes (g); or a promise to pay which is only the recognition of a legal obligation resulting from the contract contained in the writing (h).'

Alterations on Bills.—If a bill or note be altered in a material part after it is issued (unless merely for correcting a clerical error), the bill is null, and a new stamp is necessary (i). 'Independently, however, of the objection under the Stamp Acts, "where a bill or acceptance is materially altered after issue (k), without the assent of all parties liable on the bill, the bill is avoided, except as against a party who has himself made, authorised, or assented to the alteration, and subsequent indorsees." But if the alteration is not apparent, a holder in due course may avail himself of the bill as if it had not been altered, and may enforce payment of it according to its original tenor (l). The Act specifies the following alterations "in particular" as material, viz. any alteration of the date, the sum payable, the time or place of payment, and, where a bill has been accepted generally, the addition of a place of payment without the acceptor's assent (m).'

The stamp on foreign bills applies only to bills made in Great Britain, not to those made abroad (n); and it is not on mere probabilities that a bill bearing a foreign date will be held to have been drawn in England (o); 'and by statute bills purporting to be drawn abroad are for the purposes of the Stamp Act deemed to be so drawn, although in fact made within the United Kingdom (p). If really drawn abroad, bills 'were' not liable to the British Stamp Law; nor do the Courts of this country hold it incumbent on them to enforce foreign stamp laws (q). 'By the existing statute, however, every bill drawn or expressed to be payable, or actually paid, or indorsed, or in any manner negotiated in the United Kingdom, must have an ad valorem stamp, which, in the case of bills drawn or made, or purporting to be drawn or made, out of the United Kingdom, may be denoted by an adhesive stamp. This must be adhibited, before using the bill, by any holder into whose hands an unstamped bill comes. Penalties are imposed for failure to cancel it (r). Only one of a set of foreign bills requires to be stamped; and on proof of the loss or destruction of a duly stamped bill forming one of a set, another of the set, not issued or negotiated apart from the lost bill, may be admitted in evidence to prove its contents (s).'

329. 'Negotiation.—"A bill is negotiated when it is transferred from one person to another in such a manner as to constitute the transferee the holder of the bill (i.e. the payee or indorsee who is in possession of it, or the bearer thereof)" (a). When a bill contains words prohibiting transfer, or indicating an intention that it should not be transferable, it is valid as between the parties thereto, but, if the intention is clearly expressed, is not negotiable (b).'

Indorsement.—By means of indorsement, bills circulate as paper money, passing from hand to hand, unaffected, 'till past due,' by any latent exception (c), and with increasing credit at each indorsement (d). Bills originally payable "to the bearer," or to "a certain person or bearer," 'or on which the only or last indorsement is an indorsement in blank (e),' may be transferred 'by delivery' without indorsement, but of course without any increase of credit (f). Bills, although not taken payable "to order," may in Scotland be indorsed (g); but it 'was' otherwise in England (h) 'till the Act of 1882. Now bills payable to a specified person without the words "to order," are payable to order if transfer be not excluded by their terms (i). Indorsement to a person named is said to be "in full," 'or according to the Act "in special";' if it be in blank, the bill is payable to the holder 'or bearer (k). Any holder may convert a blank indorsement into a special one (l). Indorsement made in pencil has been held good within the custom of merchants (m).

'An indorsement, in order to operate as a negotiation, must be written on the bill itself, and signed by the indorser, whose mere signature is enough (n); it must be of the entire bill, one which purports to transfer only a part of the sum payable, or to transfer to two or more indorsees severally, not operating as a negotiation (o); it must be by all of several payees or indorsees, unless they are partners, or the indorser has authority to indorse for the others; a payee or indorsee wrongly designated, or whose name is misspelt, may indorse as described, adding, if he think fit, his proper signature; and in the absence of contrary proof, indorsements are presumed to have been made in the order in which they stand on the bill (p).'

330. The indorsement may be restrictive. Thus, it may be payable "to A. B. only," which will prevent him from indorsing it (a). 'But where a restrictive indorsement authorises further transfer, all subsequent indorsees take the bill with the same rights, and subject to the same liabilities, as the first indorsee under the restrictive indorsement (b). Or the indorsement may be "for my use"; in which case it is held that this is not a mere direction to apply the contents to the indorser's use, but a restriction which creates a trust in any one who becomes the indorsee; so that he cannot take it for the payee's debt, but must hold the contents as the money of the person interposing the restriction (c); yet the payee of such a bill may discount it, the presumption being that he acts for his constituent (d), 'or receive payment, or sue upon it; but he has no power to transfer his rights as indorsee, unless the indorsation expressly authorises him to do so (e). Or, it may be "without recourse," in which case no demand can come back on the indorser, who would otherwise be liable (f). Or a condition 'might' be annexed to the indorsation which 'would' be available against the acceptor, if the bill 'should' be accepted with such condition in the indorsement (g); 'but now a conditional indorsement may be disregarded by the payer, and payment to the indorsee is valid, whether the condition has been fulfilled or not (h).'

332. It may be made at any time, even after the bill or note is past due, 'until restrictively indorsed, or paid or discharged by or for the acceptor, or in the case of accommodation bills, by or for the person accommodated (a)'; but whether it carries the bill discharged of latent exceptions as between the original debtor and creditor, is a question which 'was' differently viewed in Scotland and in England. In England it has not this effect if made after the day of payment, or when marks of dishonour are on the bill (b). In Scotland the decisions greatly varied. It 'was' held that indorsement, even after the bill is due, when it 'bore' no marks of dishonour, 'carried' the bill free of latent claims (c); but when it 'had' been retired, and so marked, and again put into circulation (d), or dishonoured, and noted on the bill as such (e), the indorsee 'was' held liable to latent exceptions. When, again, the bill 'was' indorsed or discounted in circumstances which, in the opinion of a jury, ought to have excited suspicion and called for inquiry, 'or, more correctly, in circumstances which showed mala fides on his part,' the indorsee 'was' held subject to those objections to which the indorser was liable (f).

'Negotiation of Overdue Bills.—By the Mercantile Law Amendment (Scotland) Act the law of Scotland was assimilated to the law of England, and it was enacted that an indorsee of a bill indorsed when overdue should take it subject to all objections or exceptions to which it was subject in the hands of the indorser (g). This is repealed, and the Bills of Exchange Act provides that an overdue bill when negotiated is "subject to any defect of title affecting it at its maturity, and thenceforward no person who takes it can acquire or give a better title than that which the person who took it had" (h). A bill payable on demand is deemed to be overdue in the meaning of the foregoing enactment when it appears on its face to have been in circulation for an unreasonable length of time, which is a question of fact (i). Every negotiation is prima facie presumed to have been made before the bill was overdue, unless the indorsement bears date after the maturity of the bill (k). Any one taking a bill not overdue with notice that it has been dishonoured, takes it subject to any defect of title attaching to it at the time of dishonour (l). The drawer, or a prior indorser, or the acceptor, to whom a bill is negotiated back, may reissue and further negotiate the bill, subject to the provisions of the Act, but cannot enforce the bill against any intervening party on the bill to whom he was liable (m).'

333A. 'Holder in Due Course.—A holder in due course is a holder who has taken a bill, complete and regular on the face of it, under the following conditions, namely, (1) that he became the holder of it (a) before it was overdue, and without notice of dishonour; (2) that he took it in good faith and for value, and without notice at the time of negotiation to him of any defect in the title of the person who negotiated it (b). The title of one who negotiates a bill is defective, when he obtained the bill, or the acceptance of it, by fraud (c), duress, force and fear (d), or other unlawful means, or for an illegal consideration (e), or when he negotiates it in breach of faith, or under such circumstances as amount to a fraud. A holder (whether for value or not) who derives his title through a holder in due course, and who is not himself a party to any fraud or illegality affecting it, has all the rights of that holder in due course as regards the acceptor and parties prior to that holder (f).'

(a) A holder is "the payee or indorsee of a bill, or one who is in possession of it, or the bearer thereof." The Act, § 2.

(b) Jones v. Gordon, L. R. 2 App. Ca. 616; 47 L. J. Bkr. 1.

(c) See supra, § 13 sq.

(d) See supra, § 12.

(e) See the Act, § 27; and above, § 35 sq.

(f) 45 and 46 Vict. c. 61, § 29.

333B. 'Consideration and Value.—The Bills of Exchange Act does not affect our law, that valuable consideration is not necessary to support an obligation (a). But want of value (non-onerosity) may be pleaded as evidence when the bill is challenged on another ground, as for illegality, fraud, or failure of the consideration, or because it was an accommodation bill. As regards the law of England, it is provided that any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract, or an antecedent debt or liability, constitutes valuable consideration (b). When value has at any time been given for a bill, the holder is deemed to be a holder for value as regards the acceptor and all who became parties to the bill before that time. And a holder who has a lien on the bill is a holder for value to the extent of the sum for which he has a lien (c). An antecedent debt constitutes valuable consideration (d); as when a banker credits a customer's account with the amount of a bill or cheque (e).

'Presumption of Value and Good Faith.—Every one whose signature appears on the bill is prima facie deemed to have become a party thereto for value. Every holder of a bill is prima facie deemed to be a holder in due course (f); but if in an action on a bill it is admitted or proved that the acceptance, issue, or subsequent negotiation of the bill is affected with fraud, duress, or force and fear, or illegality, the burden of proof is shifted, unless and until the holder proves that, subsequent to the alleged fraud or illegality, value has in good faith been given for the bill (g). A thing is deemed to be done in good faith, where it is in fact done honestly, whether it is done negligently or not (h).

'The general rule was, that if it were alleged that the bill was not onerous or not for value, this could be proved only by the writ or oath of the holder, unless fraud were relevantly averred or there were facts, admitted or proved scripto, inferring that value had not been given (i). It is now, however, enacted that "in any judicial proceeding in Scotland any fact relating to a bill of exchange, bank cheque, or promissory note which is relevant to any question of liability thereon, may be proved by parole evidence"; but this, it is provided, does not affect former rules as to caution and consignation in sists of diligence and suspensions (k).

'This provision has given occasion to difference of opinion on the bench, and cannot be said to be happily expressed. It was probably intended to assimilate our practice to that of England in regard to proof of value, and of the discharge of bills and notes. If it be read strictly, it applies only to questions of liability arising on the bill or note ("thereon"), and does not affect the rules of evidence in collateral or extrinsic conditions or agreements. It would seem that in a question with a holder in due course, or any one taking under him, this section will not allow a party to the bill to contradict by parole the legal effect, by the law merchant or under the Act, of his contract upon the face of the bill, such contracts being subject to the ordinary rule that written contracts cannot be contradicted or varied by oral evidence. But while this is law in England, and has been so laid down by high authority in Scotland (l), it must be admitted that the words of the section have prima facie a much wider range. It may be useful to remember that in England oral evidence is "admissible (1) to show that what purports to be a complete contract has never come into operative existence," (in other words, to qualify the delivery which is necessary (m) to complete the contract); "(2) to impeach the consideration for the contract; or (3) to show that the contract has been discharged by payment, release, or otherwise" (n), except by renunciation (o). In regard to the first of these points, parole has always been admissible in Scotland. If the operation of the Act were to be restricted to the assimilation of our law to that of England, which may have been the intention, and appears to be the inclination of the judicial mind, the changes effected will be only under heads (2) and (3).'

until delivery of the instrument in order to give effect thereto (a), provided that where an acceptance is written on a bill, and the drawee gives notice to, or according to the directions of, the person entitled to the bill that he has accepted it, the acceptance then becomes complete and irrevocable (b). As between immediate parties, and as regards a remote party other than a holder in due course, the delivery in order to be effectual must be made either by or under the authority of the party drawing, accepting, or indorsing as the case may be; and it may be shown to have been conditional or for a special purpose only, and not for the purpose of transferring the property in the bill (c). But if the bill be in the hands of a holder in due course, a valid delivery of the bill by all parties prior to him so as to make them liable to him is conclusively presumed (d). Where a bill is no longer in the possession of one who has signed it as drawer, acceptor, or indorser, a valid and unconditional delivery by him is presumed till the contrary is proved (e). A promissory note is inchoate and incomplete until delivery thereof to the payee or bearer (f).'

333D. 'The holder of a bill may sue on the bill in his own name. If a holder in due course, he holds the bill free from any defect of title of prior parties, as well as from mere personal defences available to prior parties among themselves, and may enforce payment against all parties liable on the bill. Where the holder's title is defective, a holder in due course to whom he negotiates the bill obtains a good and complete title to the bill; and if he obtains payment of the bill, the person who pays him in due course gets a valid discharge for the bill (a).'

333E. 'Liability of Drawer and Indorsers.—The drawer of a bill by drawing it engages that on due presentment it shall be accepted (a) and paid according to its tenor, and that if it be dishonoured he will compensate the holder or any indorser who is compelled to pay it, provided that the requisite proceedings on dishonour be duly taken. And he is precluded from denying to a holder in due course the existence of the payee and his capacity to indorse (b). The indorser of a bill by indorsing it engages that on due presentment it shall be accepted and paid according to its tenor, and that if it be dishonoured he will compensate the holder or a subsequent indorser who is compelled to pay it, provided that the requisite proceedings on dishonour be duly taken. He is precluded from denying to a holder in due course the genuineness and regularity in all respects of the drawer's signature and all previous indorsements; and also from denying to his immediate or a subsequent indorsee that the bill was at the time of his indorsement a valid and subsisting bill, and that he had a good title thereto (c). Where a person signs a bill, otherwise than as drawer or acceptor, he thereby incurs the liabilities of an indorser to a holder in due course (d).'

333F. 'A Transferor by Delivery is the holder of a bill payable to bearer who negotiates it by delivery without indorsing it; and he is not liable on the instrument. He warrants, however, to his immediate transferee, being a holder for value, that the bill is what it purports to be, that he has a right to transfer it, and that at the time of transfer he is not aware of any fact which renders it valueless (a). The transferee obtains by the transfer for value such title as the transferor had in the bill; i.e. a title equivalent to a duly intimated assignation; and in addition the right to have the indorsement of the transferor (b).'

333G. 'Discharge of Bills.—A bill is discharged by payment in due course by or on behalf of the drawee or acceptor, i.e. by payment made at or after its maturity to the holder thereof, in good faith and without notice that his title is defective (a). Payment by drawer or indorser does not discharge a bill, but if the bill be payable to or to the order of a third party, the drawer who pays may enforce payment against the acceptor, but may not reissue the bill. When a bill is paid by an indorser, or where a bill payable to drawer's order is paid by the drawer, the party paying is remitted to his former rights as regards the acceptor or antecedent parties, and he may, if he thinks fit, strike out his own and subsequent indorsements, and again negotiate the bill (b). Payment of an accommodation bill by the person accommodated discharges it (c). A banker who in good faith, and in the ordinary course of business, pays a bill drawn on him, and payable to order on demand, is not bound to show the genuineness of indorsements, or that they were authorised, but is deemed to have paid in due course although they were forged or made without authority (d).'

(a) 44 and 46 Vict. c. 61, § 59 (1). Bills of course are also discharged in the ways in which other obligations are discharged (infra, § 555 seq.), as by renunciation in writing or with delivery of the bill (the Act, § 62), by confusion (ib. 61), cancellation (ib. 63, 64.—Dominion Bk. v. Anderson & Co., 1888; 15 R. 408; aff. 1891, A.C. 592; 18 R. H. L. 21), prescription (infra, § 594), etc. As to giving up the bill and its effect in evidence, see below, § 578 (a), (b), (c).

334. Negotiation of Bills.—The negotiation of bills (a) consists of three acts—Presentment, Protest, and Notice.

(a) The word negotiation is used in a different sense in the Act; see above, § 329.

335. Presentment is the act of showing or offering at the place of payment a draft to the drawee, or a bill to the acceptor, or note to the maker; that in the one case the bill may be accepted or paid, and 'that' in the other payment 'of the note may be' made.

336. (1.) Presentment for Acceptance.—The presentment of a draft for acceptance has a double purpose,—to satisfy the bill-holder whether he is to rely on the payment of the debt; and to preserve "recourse," or a demand for indemnification against the drawer and indorsers, if the drawee should not accept. The presentment must be at the drawee's place of residence, when the bill is made payable there; and if the drawee has absconded, 'or is dead, or bankrupt, or is a fictitious person, or one not having capacity to contract by bill, or' is not there to be found, and cannot be heard of at the banking-houses, the bill is to be held as dishonoured (a). If the drawee has changed his place of residence, the holder must endeavour to find it out and present the bill there (b). If the drawee cannot himself be found, nor his residence discovered, the bill should be presented to some one authorised to act for him (c). If the drawee be dead, the presentment to his heirs may be proper, but 'is' not necessary (d); and if the bill be payable at a banker's, a presentment at that banker's is sufficient (e). 'When authorised by agreement or usage, presentment may be made through the post office. Presentment is excused if the drawee is dead or bankrupt, a fictitious person, or one incapable of contracting by bill; when after the exercise of reasonable diligence presentment cannot be effected; and where, though the presentment has been irregular, acceptance has been refused on some other ground; but not because the holder has reason to believe that the bill on presentment will be dishonoured (f).' If, on the bill being presented, acceptance should be refused, this must be shown by a protest, and notice must be given to the drawer and indorsers (g). If the time of payment depend on the presentment (as in bills payable "after sight"), the bill-holder is bound within a reasonable time to present for acceptance (h), 'because presentment for acceptance is necessary in order to fix the maturity of the instrument. Where a bill expressly stipulates that it shall be presented for acceptance, or where a bill is drawn payable elsewhere than at the residence or place of business of the drawee, it must be presented for acceptance before it can be presented for payment; but in no other case is presentment for acceptance necessary in order to render liable any party to the bill (i). So' the time of presentment is somewhat discretionary, or controlled only by the general rule, that there must be no undue or unnecessary delay, which is properly a question for the jury (k). 'Subject to the provisions of the Act, when a bill payable after sight is negotiated, the holder must either present it for acceptance, or negotiate it within a reasonable time, failing which drawers and indorsers are discharged (l).'

If the bill be drawn "at sight," it need not be presented for acceptance. If the bill be payable "on demand," or if the day of payment be certain, the holder is not required to present it for acceptance, but may present it at once for acceptance and for payment when due (m); but an agent must present a bill for acceptance (n). The presentment must be made 'to the drawee, or a person authorised to accept or refuse acceptance on his behalf, before the bill is overdue,' at a seasonable time (o), and within the known business hours of a banker's or merchant's attendance (p). The bill may be left for acceptance for twenty-four hours (q); 'but the time depends on usage at the place (r). A bill is dishonoured by non-acceptance when, being duly presented, acceptance is refused or cannot be obtained; or when presentment for acceptance is excused and the bill is not accepted (s). Subject to the provisions of the Act, when a bill is dishonoured by non-acceptance, an immediate right of recourse against the drawer and indorsers accrues to the holder, and no presentment for payment is required (t). The holder of a bill may refuse to take a qualified acceptance, and if he does not obtain an unqualified acceptance, may treat the bill as dishonoured by non-acceptance (u).'

337. (2.) Presentment for Payment.—Bills must 'subject to the provisions of the Act (a),' in order to preserve recourse against the other parties, be duly presented for payment; 'but not necessarily' where acceptance has been previously refused (b). The 'usual' evidence of such presentment is a notarial protest (c). If payable "on demand" (in which case no days of grace are allowed), the presentment must be 'within a reasonable time after its issue, and after its indorsement respectively, in order to make drawer and indorser liable,' and the risk of delay will be with the bill-holder (d). If put into circulation, it must be presented within a reasonable time after it is received, which rather seems to be considered as a question of fact for the jury than of legal construction for the Court (e). In general, it seems to be held that a presentment on the day after receipt by post is enough (f). If payable so many days "after sight," the bill or note must be presented on the last day of grace after the expiration of that time, reckoned from the day on which the presentment for acceptance took place. If payable at a day certain, the bill or note must be presented on the last day of grace (g). It must be presented 'by the holder or one authorised to receive payment on his behalf, at' a reasonable 'hour on a business' day (h) 'at the proper place, either to the person designed in the bill as payer, or one authorised to pay, or refuse payment, on his behalf, if with the exercise of reasonable diligence such person can there be found (i).' If regular hours be fixed by usage, they must be observed; if payable at a banker's, bank hours must be observed (k).

The place of payment may be indicated either in the drawing of the bill or in its acceptance. In the drawing, it is commonly indicated by the mere address of the drawee (l).

If any other place be mentioned for payment besides that implied in the address, and the bill have not, when so presented, been accepted, it may be protested in that place for non-payment (m). If a particular house be mentioned either in the body of the bill or note, or in a marginal note, or in the acceptance, the presentment for payment must be there (n). If the place be mentioned in the acceptance, and without the restrictive words, "there only," or "not elsewhere," the acceptance is held to be general, and the presentment for payment need not necessarily be there, but to the acceptor himself. But if the acceptance specify the place with the above restrictive words, the presentment for payment must be at the particular place or house so indicated. And no difference of construction has been admitted of such restrictive specification, whether proceeding from the drawer or from the acceptor (o). Bills drawn payable at any other place than the places therein mentioned as the residence of the drawee, if not accepted, are to be protested for non-payment at the place of payment expressed in the draft, without any further presentment to the drawee (p). 'A bill in which no place of payment is specified and no address given is to be presented at the drawee's or acceptor's place of business if known, and if not, at his ordinary residence if known. In any cases not already specified, a bill is duly presented if presented to the drawee or acceptor wherever he can be found, or if presented at his last known place of business or residence (q). If with reasonable diligence no person authorised to pay or refuse payment can be found when a bill is presented at the proper place, no further presentment to the drawee or acceptor is required. Bills drawn upon or accepted by two or more persons, not partners, must, if no place of payment be specified, be presented to all. If the drawee or acceptor be dead, presentment is to be made to his personal representative, if any, and if with reasonable diligence he can be found. Presentment through the post office is sufficient if authorised by agreement or usage (r). If a bill, at so many days "after sight," have been presented for acceptance, and refused, but afterwards accepted for honour of the drawer, the presentment for payment is correctly made when the bill is at maturity, 'reckoning not from' the acceptance for honour, 'but from the date of the noting for non-acceptance'; and this both in a question with the drawer, and with the acceptor for honour (s). 'Where the holder of a bill presents it for payment, he must exhibit the bill to the person from whom he demands payment, and when it is paid in full, must deliver it up to the party paying it (t).'

337A. '(3.) Delay in making presentment for payment is excused when it is caused by circumstances beyond the control of the holder, and not imputable to his default, misconduct, or negligence. When the cause of delay ceases to operate, presentment must be made with reasonable diligence.

'It is not necessary to present for payment a bill accepted generally, in order to make the acceptor liable (a). Presentment for payment is dispensed with (1) when with reasonable diligence it cannot be effected, but not merely because the holder has reason to believe that the bill will on presentment be dishonoured; (2) where the drawee is a fictitious person; (3) as regards the drawer, where the drawee or acceptor is not bound as between himself and the drawer to accept or pay the bill, and the drawer has no reason to believe that the bill would be paid if presented (as, e.g., where the acceptor is an accommodation party (b)); (4) as regards the indorser, where the bill was made or accepted for his accommodation, and he has no reason to believe that it would be paid if presented (c). (5) It is also dispensed with by waiver of presentment, express or implied (d).'

337B. 'Dishonour by Non-Payment.—A bill is dishonoured by non-payment when it is duly presented for payment, and payment is refused or cannot be obtained, or when presentment is excused and the bill is overdue and unpaid. Subject to the provisions of the Act, when a bill is dishonoured by non-payment, an immediate right of recourse against the drawer and indorsers accrues to the holder (a).'

(a) 45 and 46 Vict. c. 61, § 47.

338. Protest.—The protest is a notarial declaration, before witnesses, on presentment, that the bill has been presented; has not been accepted, or not paid (a); and that the bill-holder is to enforce payment not only against the acceptor (if the protest be for non-payment), but also against the drawer and indorsers. 'A protest must contain a copy of the bill, must be signed by the notary making it, and must specify the person at whose request it is made, the place and date, the cause or reason for protesting, the demand made, and the answer given, if any, or the fact that the drawee or acceptor could not be found (b).' A note is made 'on the day of dishonour' on the bill at protesting (which is termed noting the bill), and from that note and from the notary's book the notary may make out the instrument at any time (c); but the mere note on the bill is insufficient to authorise diligence. The protest, 'which must be conform to the noting which is its warrant (d),' must be extended on paper stamped with a rateable duty according to the amount of the bill or note (e). It is signed by the notary, but the subscription of the witnesses is not indispensable (f); 'and though the protest bears that the notary made the demand for payment, the notarial presentment is by custom generally and sufficiently made by his clerk, or even by a banker's clerk (g).' And none but a notary can protest a bill; nor can any notary protest a bill drawn or accepted by himself (h).

339. The protest 'was' indispensably necessary, not only for recording in order to authorise summary diligence even against the acceptor or maker (a), but also for recourse against the drawer and indorsers. The want of protest 'could' not be supplied, even by oath of the party that he knew of the dishonour of the bill. The bankruptcy of the drawee, or acceptor, or maker of the note, 'did' not, without a protest, ground a claim of recourse. 'But since 1856, it is not necessary to take a protest merely in order to preserve recourse against the drawer and indorsers, or acceptor, for which purpose presentment and dishonour may be proved by any competent evidence (b). When a notary cannot be found at the place where the bill is dishonoured, a certificate, signed by a householder or substantial resident and two witnesses, attesting the dishonour of the bill, operates as if it were a formal protest; though apparently not to warrant summary diligence (c).'

A notarial protest of presentment of a draft, where the drawee is possessed of funds of the drawer, is equivalent to an intimated assignation (d). 'A foreign bill dishonoured by non-acceptance must be protested; and if accepted and not paid, must be protested for non-payment, otherwise drawer and indorsers are discharged (e).'

(b) 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, § 13; 45 and 46 Vict. c. 61, § 51, 52. There are a few cases in which protest is still necessary; see the Act, § 65 (1), 68 (1), 67 (1), (4), 14 (3).

(d) A protest not being necessary in England (except to certain effects under special statutes), questions as to the ambiguity of notice have arisen in England for which there was scarcely room in Scotland. See § 311, 315, 341, and 1465.

340. Notice of Dishonour.—This is the announcement made to those against whom recourse is demandable, that the bill or note has been dishonoured, 'by non-acceptance or non-payment'; and that recourse is to be taken (a). The use of it is to enable each in his order to take precautions for his safety and indemnification. But it is now settled that due notice forms an absolute and indispensable condition of the drawer's or indorser's responsibility, whether any loss has arisen from want of notice or not; 'and any drawer or indorser to whom such notice is not given is discharged (b).' Notice must be given of non-acceptance, if the bill-holder, though not bound to present for acceptance, does so (c); 'but the rights of a subsequent holder in due course are not prejudiced by the omission to give notice of such dishonour. Where due notice of non-acceptance is given, notice of subsequent non-payment is unnecessary, unless in the meantime the bill has been accepted (d).' It is unnecessary against the acceptor or maker of a note (e). Neglect to give notice is a discharge to all the other parties in the bill, on the ground that it is implied in the obligation of each indorser that he shall have such notice; and it is not necessary to show loss from want of notice, the law presuming it (f).

It 'was' questioned whether one who has guaranteed payment of a bill is entitled to notice; 'but the question is now decided in the negative (g).'

Notice requires to be given within a certain time, 'which was' different in foreign and in inland bills. The time in foreign bills is regulated by the usage of merchants (h); and the rules seem to be, that to one residing in the same place, notice must be given before the expiration of the day after the dishonour, and so that it may reach the person that day (i); that for notice by each successive indorsee to the indorser preceding, a day is allowed after the notice to himself (k); but this only on the footing that there has not, in the course of the transmission, been undue delay at any one stage: for if notice to any one indorser has been beyond the day, the drawer and prior indorsers are discharged (l). To persons resident elsewhere, notice must be despatched by the next post; or if that should be a day of public rest, by the post following (m). In inland bills in Scotland, notice within a fortnight 'was' sufficient (n); but this extreme latitude 'was' strictly confined to inland bills and notes, and 'did' not apply to bills drawn on or from England or Ireland (o).

Statutory Rules.—This was altered by the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, which made the preceding rules as to foreign bills substantially applicable to inland bills. That provision was repealed by the Bills of Exchange Act, which provides in regard to notice of dishonour: (1) that it must be given by or for the holder or an indorser liable on the bill; (2) that it may be given by an agent in his own name or in name of any party entitled to give notice, whether his principal or not; (3) that notice by or for the holder enures for the benefit of all subsequent holders and all prior indorsers having a right of recourse against the party to whom it is given; (4) that notice by or for an indorser enures for the benefit of the holder and all indorsers subsequent to the party to whom notice is given; (5) that it may be given in writing or orally in any terms which sufficiently identify the bill, and intimate that it has been dishonoured by non-acceptance or non-payment; (6) that the return of the bill to the drawer or indorser is, in point of form, deemed a sufficient notice of dishonour; (7) that a written notice need not be signed, and may be supplemented and validated by oral communication, and misdescription of the bill vitiates the notice only if it misleads; (8) that notice may be given to an agent of the party; (9) that notice must be given to a personal representative of a party known to be dead, if there be any and he can be found with reasonable diligence; (10) that it may be given either to a bankrupt or his trustee; (11) that it must be given to each of several drawers or indorsers, unless they are partners, or one be authorised to receive it for the others; (12) that it may be given as soon as the bill is dishonoured, and must be given within a reasonable time thereafter. It is not given within a reasonable time (in the absence of special circumstances), unless, if the parties giving and receiving it reside in the same place, it is given or sent off in time to reach the latter on the day after the dishonour; and unless, if they reside in different places, it is sent off on the day after the dishonour, if there be a post at a convenient hour on that day, if not, by the next post thereafter. It is further provided, (13) that when the bill is in the hands of an agent, he may either give notice to the parties or to his principal, and in the latter case, within the same time as if he were the holder; and the principal has the same time for giving notice as if the agent had been an independent holder; (14) that a party receiving notice has the same time after receipt for giving notice to antecedent parties that the holder has after the dishonour (p).

'Delay in giving notice of dishonour is excused for the same reasons, and to the same extent, as delay in presenting for payment (q). And notice of dishonour is dispensed with when, after the exercise of reasonable diligence, it cannot be given to or does not reach the party to be charged; by waiver, express or implied, whether before or after the proper time for notice. As regards the drawer: (1) where drawer and drawee are the same; (2) where the drawee is a fictitious person, or without capacity to contract; (3) where the bill is presented for payment to the drawer; (4) where the drawee or acceptor is under no obligation to accept or pay; (5) where the drawer has countermanded payment. As regards the indorser: (1) where the indorser knew at the time of indorsing that the drawee was a fictitious person or incapable of contracting; (2) where the bill is presented for payment to the indorser; (3) or was made for his accommodation (r).’ A bill-holder may be ignorant of the residence of those whose mere names are on the bill; and all that the law requires in that case is, that he shall use due diligence to discover the residence of the parties, and give notice as soon as it can reasonably be given (s). It is sufficient notice, if a letter properly addressed be in due time put into the post office (t); but an error in the address will make it requisite to prove the actual delivery of the letter (u). The drawer, by consenting to a delay or indulgence to the acceptor, waives the necessity of notice (v).

341. In Scotland, the necessity of a protest ‘gave’ a clear import to the notice of its having been made. In England several difficulties have occurred as to the import of notice, which ‘could’ occur with us only where no protest ‘had’ been made. And the rule there adopted ‘was,’ that the notice must contain all that a protest imports, viz. that the bill was dishonoured, and that the party looks for payment to the indorser (a). Bankruptcy is not equivalent to protest, neither is it equivalent to notice: but ‘although’ circumstances necessarily inferring knowledge of the dishonour, and of the intention to demand recourse, ‘are not’ enough ‘to dispense with notice of dishonour,’ the right to notice may be waived (b).

(a) Solarte v. Palmer, 7 Bing. 530; aff. in H. L., 1 Bing. N. S. 194; 3 Ill. 122. This case was overruled, and the rule is that notice of dishonour, i.e. that the bill has been presented to the acceptor and not paid, is sufficient. King v. Bickley, 2 Q. B. 421. Paul v. Joel, 3 H. & N. 455; 4 H. & N. 355. Bailey v. Porter, 14 M. & W. 44. Smith’s Merc. Law, 246-8. See above, § 340, where the provisions of the Act are given.

342. Diligence.—The demand upon a bill is made against the acceptor for the contents of the bill, with interest ‘from the time of presentment for payment if the bill is payable on demand, and from the maturity of the bill in any other case,’ and charges, ‘i.e. the expenses of noting, or when protest is necessary and the protest has been extended, the expenses of protest’; or against the indorsers, ‘or drawer,’ for the contents of the bill ‘with interest and charges as above (a)’; and in the case of a foreign bill, for exchange, being the difference of money where drawn and where payable; and also for re-exchange, being the damage arising from the dishonour of the bill and the necessity of the bill-holder’s having recourse back to the place of drawing (b).

(a) The additions are from the Act, § 57, the third subsection of which leaves the Court to exercise discretion as to awarding interest as damages.

In America the rule of damage on returned foreign bills is different, and varies in the several States—in some twenty per cent., in others six, seven and a half, etc. See 3 Kent, Com. 116 et seq. The drawer and indorsers are certainly liable for re-exchange, and so, though conflicting opinions have been given, appears to be the acceptor. M’Laren’s Bell’s Com. i. 431, note. 343. The demand on bills or notes may, 'if the holder's title be clear on the face of the bill (a),' be enforced summarily, without the necessity of an action, by a decree of registration, after the analogy of the decree by consent (b). But the person making the demand must either have the bill to deliver up on payment, or he must give full indemnity if it should be lost (c). 'Nothing in the Bills of Exchange Act, or in any repeal effected thereby, extends, or restricts, or any way alters or affects, the law and practice in Scotland in regard to summary diligence (d). Consequently, the repeal of § 10 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act does not affect the provision, that summary diligence shall not be competent on any bill or note issued without a date (e).'

344. The protest must be registered in the books of a competent Court (a), within six months from the date of the bill in case of non-acceptance, or six months from the date of payment in case of non-payment; and it would seem that in a case where protest has been taken at once for non-acceptance and non-payment, the day of payment will be the terminus a quo in reckoning the six months (b). The instrument itself and the record must be free from erasure; but an erasure in the extract was held not fatal to diligence, being in a word unimportant (c).

(c) Crichton v. Watt, 1830; 9 S. 68; 1 Ill. 238.

345. A co-acceptor of a bill is entitled, on retiring it, to proceed with the diligence to the effect of operating his relief without any assignation (a).

(a) Walker v. Forbes & Co., 1829; 7 S. 684; 1 Ill. 238.

346. Accommodation Bills.—Although bills and notes properly spring from real transactions, and so are the representatives of actual debts, the easy form of their constitution and transmission has led to their being used in raising money on credit, for accommodation, without any real debt existing between the drawer and drawee, or with the indorsers. These are called Accommodation Bills, or Wind Bills, from the fictitious nature of the transaction. And this sort of transaction is neither unlawful nor without use. 'The Act defines an "accommodation party to a bill" as "a person who has signed a bill as drawer, acceptor, or indorser without receiving value therefor, and for the purpose of lending his name to some other person" (a).'

(a) 45 and 46 Vict. c. 61, § 28 (1).

347. There are some points in which real and accommodation bills differ. In a real bill the parties are liable as they stand on the bill: the acceptor is the real debtor; and the drawer, and each indorser in his order, is surety to the bill-holder. In accommodation bills, the acceptor, 'if he be the party accommodating,' is the mandatary of the drawer, who requests him to pay; and on payment he becomes his creditor ex mandato; 'but any party, whether drawer or acceptor, or indorser, may be the accommodation party.' The bill-holder, indeed, may have received the bill as a real bill; 'and it is enacted that "an accommodation party is liable on the bill to a holder for value; and it is immaterial whether when such holder took the bill he knew such party to be an accommodation party or not"' (a); but to the original parties it is a mere accommodation, and their rights will be regulated on that footing.

(a) The Act, § 28 (2). See Boag v. Menzies, 1849; 11 D. 362. Stewart v. Wyllie, 1849; 11 D. 1123. Strathern v. Masterman & Co., 1850; 12 D. 1087.

348. The neglect of 'presentment for payment or of' notice 'of dishonour,' therefore, to the drawer 'or other party accommodated' will not bar recourse on him, if there be no fund in the drawee's hand, or no reasonable ground to expect the bill to be honoured (a). Of this the bill-holder must run the risk if he should neglect to give notice. If the drawer have, at drawing, effects with the drawee, it will entitle to notice, as if it were not an accommodation bill. And in the same way, if the drawer have good ground, on any other account, to look for acceptance, this will give him right to notice. Where a bill is drawn for the use of another, the dishonour of it must be intimated (b).

(a) 45 and 46 Vict. c. 61, § 46, 50.

(b) See on the subject of this section, Thomson on Bills, 373. Cory v. Scott, 3 B. & Ald. 619; 1 Ill. 239. Norton v. Pickering, 8 B. & Cr. 610. Henderson v. Kerr, 1829; 8 S. 121. *Dirom v. C. 508-34. 1 Bell's Com. 427. Smith's Merc. Law, 275.

349. Sexennial Prescription.—Bills and notes are intended for immediate use, not as securities for permanent loans. And the want of the ordinary checks on forgery has led to a limitation, by which a bill or note loses all effect as an obligation on the expiration of six years from the time when payment is demandable: i.e. from the last day of grace, if payable on a day certain; if on demand, from the date; if at sight (a), from the last day of grace after presentment, or the day before if the last be a holiday (b).

(a) But cf. § 327, 595.

349A. 'Lost Bills.—If a bill be lost before it is overdue, the holder may apply to the drawer to give him another bill of the same tenor, giving security to the drawer, if required, to indemnify him against all persons whatever in case the lost bill be found; and the drawer may be compelled to grant such a duplicate bill (a). And in any action upon a bill the Court may order that the loss of the instrument shall not be set up, provided a sufficient indemnity be given against the claims of any other person upon the instrument (b).'

See also the distinction in the case of loss between a bill in a negotiable state and a bill not negotiable, Grant on Banking, 422; Chitty on Bills, 100; 2 Parsons on Bills, 295.

349B. 'Conflict of Laws.—When a bill drawn in one country is negotiated, accepted, or payable in another, the following rules obtain under the statute: (1) The validity of a bill as regards requisites in form is determined by the law of the place of issue; and the validity in form of the other contracts on the bill by the law of the place where each such contract is made, i.e. the place of delivery which completes the contract (supra, § 333c). But a bill issued abroad is not invalid for want of being stamped according to the law of the place of issue. And a bill issued abroad may be treated as valid between parties to it in the United Kingdom, if it conform as regards requisites in point of form to the law of the United Kingdom. (2) The interpretation of each contract on the bill is determined by the law of the place where such contract is made; provided that the indorsement abroad of an inland bill is construed, as regards the payer, by the law of the United Kingdom (a). (3) The holder's duties with regard to presentment, protest, notice, or otherwise, are determined by the law of the place where the act is done or the bill is dishonoured (b). (4) Where a bill is drawn out of, but payable in, the United Kingdom, and the sum payable is not expressed in British currency, the amount shall, in the absence of some express stipulation, be calculated according to the rate of exchange for sight drafts at the place of payment on the day when the bill is payable (c). (5) When a bill is drawn in one country and is payable in another, the due date thereof is determined according to the law of the place where it is payable (d).'

349C. 'Promissory Notes.—Subject to the provisions in Part IV. of the Bills of Exchange Act, the provisions of that Act relating to bills apply, with the necessary modifications (a), to promissory notes, the maker being deemed in applying these provisions to correspond with the acceptor of a bill, and the first indorser of a note with the drawer of an accepted bill payable to drawer's order. But the provisions of the Act as to presentment for acceptance, acceptance, acceptance supra protest, and bills in a set, are expressly excluded from applying to notes. Protest of a dishonoured foreign note is unnecessary (b).

'Besides the special provisions as to notes already mentioned (c), it is enacted that a promissory note may be made by two or more makers, who may be liable thereon jointly, or jointly and severally, according to its tenor (d). Where a note payable on demand has been indorsed, it must be presented for payment within a reasonable time after the indorsement, otherwise the indorser is discharged. What is reasonable time is determined with regard to the nature of the instrument (e.g. bank note or otherwise), the usage of trade, and the facts of the particular case (e). A note payable on demand is not overdue, so as to affect the holder with defects of title of which he had no notice, by reason that it appears that a reasonable time for presenting it for payment has elapsed since its issue (f).'

349D. 'A note in the body of it made payable at a particular place must be presented for payment there in order to make the maker liable. In other cases presentment for payment is not necessary to make a maker liable, but it is necessary in order to make the indorser of a note liable. Where a note is in the body of it made payable at a particular place, presentment there is necessary in order to render an indorser liable; but when a place of payment is indicated only by way of memorandum, presentment at that place is sufficient to render the indorser liable; but a presentment to the maker elsewhere, if sufficient in other respects, shall also suffice (a).'

350. Nature and Kinds of Partnership.—This contract combines the capacities, industry, skill, funds, and credit of several in the prosecution of a common object of trade, manufacture, or professional employment (a). It involves the principles of many separate contracts, as Sale, Location, Pledge, Mandate, Trust. Under Partnership may be considered,—Partnership Proper; Joint Trade or Adventure; Joint-Stock Companies; and Public Chartered Companies.

I. PARTNERSHIP PROPER.

351. Definition.—Partnership may be described as a mutual contract and voluntary association of two or more (a) persons for the acquisition of gain or profit, with a contribution for that end of stipulated shares of goods, money, skill, and industry; the stock of the society being held pro indiviso in trust for the creditors. It is distinguished from joint purchase, and also from community arising from common property, which, though held pro indiviso, involves no trust for the creditors (b). It is in legal construction held, on the one hand, to imply an unlimited mandate or procuration to each partner to bind the company in the line of its trade or employment (c); and, on the other, a guarantee by each to third parties of all the engagements legally undertaken in the social name. 'Contrary to the rule formerly supposed to exist, that participation in the profits of a business afforded an absolute presumption of the existence of a partnership, it was established in Cox v. Hickman that, although a right to participate in the profits of trade is prima facie evidence and an indispensable element of partnership, and there may be cases where partnership may be inferred from such participation alone, as a presumption not of law but of fact, yet the existence of the relation depends on the real intention and contract of parties (d). This section is not altered by the Partnership Act of 1890 (e).'

So the profits or a proportion of them may by agreement be appropriated to the payment of a debt, and even a certain control over the business conferred upon a creditor, without his being thereby made a partner. *Mollwo, March, & Co., cit. (e) 53 and 54 Vict. c. 39, § 1, 2.

352. Partnership Proper has a double operation: one, as it affects the immediate parties to the contract; another, as it relates to the public dealing with the company.

353. Stock.—The stock of the company, as contributed, and increased or diminished by the dealings of the company, is not only common, and held pro indiviso by all the partners; but it is vested in them in trust for the creditors of the company in the first place, and afterwards for division among the partners according to the shares of each (a).

'Partnership Property.—All property and rights and interests in property originally brought into the partnership stock, or acquired whether by purchase or otherwise on account of the firm, or for the purposes and in the course of the partnership business, are called in the Partnership Act, 1890, partnership property, and must be held and applied by the partners exclusively for the purposes of the partnership, and in accordance with the partnership agreement (b): Provided that the title to and interest in heritable estate which belongs to the partnership shall devolve according to the nature and tenure thereof, and the general rules of law applicable, but in trust, so far as necessary, for the persons beneficially interested in the land under this section of the Act (c).

'Where co-owners of any heritable estate, not itself partnership property, are partners as to profits made by its use, and purchase other land or estate out of the profits to be used in like manner, the land and estate purchased belong to them, in the absence of agreement to the contrary, not as partners, but as co-owners, for the same respective rights and interests as are held by them in the first-mentioned land or estate at the date of the purchase (d).

'Unless the contrary intention appears, property bought with the firm's money is deemed to be bought on account of the firm (e).

'Conversion.—Where land or any heritable interest therein has become partnership property, it shall, unless the contrary intention appears, be treated between the partners (including the representatives of a deceased partner), and also as between the heirs of a deceased partner and his executors or administrators, as personal or moveable and not real or heritable estate (f).'

354. Implied Mandate.—Each partner is by the law held to be "præpositus negotiis societatis"; and whatever he does in the company's name or on its credit, in the line of the company's trade, 'notwithstanding any private agreement to the contrary, or want of authority,' is held to be done for the company (a), 'unless the party dealing with him knows of such agreement or want of authority, or "does not know or believe him to be a partner" (b).' He is empowered in that line to bind the society by bill or mercantile document, whatever their private contract may be (c). Nay, even a fraud 'or other wrongful act or omission,' committed by a partner in the line of the company trade, 'or with the authority of his partners,' binds the company (d), 'unless the party seeking to charge the company was himself privy to the fraud.' But 'while a partner in a trading firm has power to borrow money for the business on the firm's credit (e),' it has been held in England that he is not empowered to bind by "deed," as in a mortgage (f).

Ch. 370. See Partnership Act, 1890, § 10. The primary test of liability is the ordinary course of the partnership business; and on this ground it has been held that, as it is not part of the ordinary business of solicitors to receive money for general purposes of investment, i.e. to be invested at their discretion, a firm is not liable for money so received and misappropriated by a partner, although it is liable for money received to be invested on specified securities. Compare Harman v. Johnson, 2 E. & B. 61; 22 L. J. Q. B. 297. Plumer v. Gregory, L. R. 18 Eq. 621; 43 L. J. Ch. 616, 803. Blair v. Bromley, 2 Ph. 354. Atkinson v. Mackreth, L. R. 2 Eq. 570; 36 L. J. Noble, 1 Mer. 572, 611; 15 R. R. 151. In suing a firm on the ground of fraud, it is necessary to aver personal fraud against one or more of the partners by name. Thomson & Co. v. 355. To the above rule there are exceptions. Thus, where the dealing is manifestly not a company matter, 'or is proved to have taken place on the credit of the partner alone' (a); and wherever the debt 'or obligation' secured is that of a partner, 'even though he may have afterwards applied the funds so obtained to the benefit of the firm,' the onus probandi is laid on the creditor to show the assent of the company (b). So, where the party contracting with the partner has notice of a limitation of power, the company is not bound (c). And where a guarantee or obligation of surety is entered into, it will not bind the company unless it be 'strictly' in reference to, 'and within the scope of,' the company's course of trade, or proof be given of its having been authorised or adopted by the company (d). But the full power is implied where the partners have consented to or acquiesced in the obligation (e); or where a party applies to his own use the bill or obligation of the company, of which he is as a creditor fairly possessed or vested with the power of disposal (f); or where a bill or note of the company, 'being a trading firm,' has found its way into the hands of an onerous and bona fide holder (g).

'It is enacted in the Partnership Act, 1890, that where one partner pledges the credit of the firm for a purpose apparently not connected with the firm's ordinary course of business, the firm is not bound, unless he is in fact specially authorised by the other partners; but this section does not affect any personal liability incurred by an individual partner (h). If it has been agreed between the partners that any restriction shall be placed on the power of any one or more of them to bind the firm, no act done in contravention of the agreement is binding on the firm with respect to persons having notice of the agreement (i). It is also enacted that a partner's wrongful act or omission in certain cases binds the firm and the partners jointly and severally (k); and that where the money or property of a third party is received by a partner within the scope of his apparent authority, and misapplied by him; or is received by the firm in the course of its business, and is misapplied by one or more partners while it is in the custody of the firm, the firm is liable to make good the loss (l).

'Admissions and representations by any partner concerning the partnership affairs and in the ordinary course of its business are evidence against the firm (m). And except in case of fraud by the partner, notice to any partner who habitually acts in the partnership affairs is notice to the firm (n).'

356. Joint Responsibility.—The partners are jointly and severally liable as guarantees to the public of the company's obligations, and so may be called on individually, on the company failing to pay the debt; the company, 'at least if it be a Scotch company,' being first called, and the debt constituted against it. In relation to each other, their responsibility is regulated by their contract (a).

357. Company a separate Person.—The company forms a separate person, competent to maintain its relations with third parties by its separate name or firm, independently of the partners; capable also of holding a lease, but not of holding feudally as a vassal (a). A company having a firm, 'i.e. a social name, as A. B. & Co., or A. & B.,' may sue or be sued by it (b); but a company having only a descriptive name can appear judicially only by or with some, 'three, or two, if there are no more,' or all of the individual names (c).

358. Delectus Personæ.—It is strongly implied, from the exuberant trust reposed by the partners in each other, and the confidential nature of the connection, that no one shall be a partner without the consent of the rest. Hence heirs, assignees, and creditors are excluded, unless it be otherwise stipulated or necessarily implied, as from the long duration of the company (a). In the Roman law, a stipulation to that effect was incompetent (b). 'One may assign a part or the whole of his interest in a firm, but only to the effect of creating a sub-partnership (c), or other right against himself, which is subject to all rights and equities existing between the assignor and his copartners, whether before or after the assignment (d). An assignment of a partner's share, whether absolute or by way of mortgage, does not entitle the assignee as against the other partners to interfere in the management during the continuance of the partnership, or to require accounts, or inspect the books, but only to receive the assignor's share of profits, as shown in the account of profits agreed to by the partners. At dissolution the assignee is entitled to receive the assignor's share of assets, and for the purpose of ascertaining that share to an account as from the date of the dissolution (e).'

359. Avowed or Anonymous Partnership.—

The former is commonly carried on and known by a firm or social name; in the latter, the trade is apparently carried on by an individual, there being latent or sleeping partners behind. The rules applicable to both are the same, on the latent partnership, or those concerned in it, being discovered (a).

(a) See below, § 364A, 386. The dormant partner is in the position of an undisclosed principal (see above, § 224A); Beckham v. Drake, 9 M. & W. 97; 11 M. & W. 315; but has in ordinary circumstances no power to bind the firm. See Holme v. Hammond, L. R. 7 Ex. 218; 41 L. J. Ex. 157 (per Cleasby, B.). Lindley, Partn. 125.

360. Constitution of Partnership.—In the constitution of partnership, a distinction is made between questions among the parties themselves, and questions with third parties. As to the parties themselves, there are two questions: Whether there be a contract so constituted as to raise the rights and responsibilities of partners? and, What share of stock and profit each is bound to contribute or entitled to claim? As to third parties, the only question is, Whether one is bound as a partner? for where he is so, it signifies nothing, in respect to the extent of his liability, what share he holds (a).

361. (1.) Evidence as between the Partners.

—Partnership is a consensual contract; and on such evidence as our law admits in proof of consent, the parties will be entitled to their rights as such, or bound to the public. This may be either a solemn written contract of partnership, duly authenticated; or a less formal writing; letters exchanged; minutes; articles subscribed by initials, and afterwards acted upon; articles written in the ledger, or otherwise identified with the trade; or circumstantial proof; or parole evidence of clerks, agents, or persons dealing with the company (a). Even where there is a contract, a question may arise whether the transaction in question be a partnership dealing, which will depend on the construction of the contract, and on the homologation or adoption of it by the company as a part of their trade (b). 'In all questions between the partners themselves, and not between strangers and the copartnership or one of the partners, the law regards only the contract they have made and the rights which it gives them inter se (c).'

(c) Cases cited. Walker v. Hirsch; 27 Ch. D. 460.

362. Where, in a question between partners, the contract is established, but the shares left doubtful, and no evidence to clear the doubt, the presumption is for equality of rights and of responsibility. But this is a presumption of fact only, and may be overcome by evidence, or by indications of a different rule having been agreed to (a). 'A bare obligation to take one into partnership, not expressing the share or interest to be given, is too vague to be enforced either by specific implement or damages (b).'

363. (2.) Evidence as to Third Parties.—
Holding out.—Responsibility may be incurred not only by the constitution of a proper partnership, but even where there is no proper constitution of partnership as between the parties themselves, and no right to the stock created in the person called upon. 'It was formerly said that' this may be by receiving, as a partner or principal, a share of the profits (a); or by an agreement entitling one to share in the profits (b); 'but these are now regarded only as indications, cogent, but not conclusive of the existence of a real partnership; and no person who does not hold himself out to the public, or to creditors and customers, as a partner, is liable to third parties for the acts of persons whose profits he shares, unless he and they are really partners inter se (c). Liability by holding out is incurred' by permitting one's name to be used, or credit relied on, as a partner,—as by the name being over the door, or used or continued in bills of parcels, cheques, etc. (d). And in such questions, similarity of name, or the continuance of a name in a firm, peculiarly exposes to this sort of responsibility (e). 'The rule is an application of the principle of personal exception (see above, § 27A), for a man who holds himself out as a partner, or allows others to do so, is barred personali exceptione from denying the character he has assumed, and upon the faith of which creditors have acted (f).'

So wages may be paid to clerks, commission to a broker, or hire to a lighterman for working a lighter, proportionally to the gains to be made, without involving the responsibility of a partner (a); and, by sub-contract with one of the partners, a third person may divide with him his share without being liable as a partner (b).

364A. (3.) 'Bovill's Act and Partnership Act.

—The principles of the common law above stated were modified, or at least defined, by a statute of 1865 (Bovill's Act), repealed by the Partnership Act of 1890 (a), which repeated or added these provisions, namely, (1) the receipt by a person of a debt or other liquidated amount by instalments or otherwise out of the accruing profits of a business; (2) the advance of money by way of loan to a person engaged, or about to engage, in any trade or undertaking, upon a written and signed contract (b) that the lender shall receive a rate of interest varying with the profits, or a share of the profits; or (3) a contract for the receipt of a share of the profits as remuneration by the servant or agent of such person; or (4) the receipt, by way of annuity, by the widow or child of the deceased partner of a trader, of a share of the profits made in the business in which such deceased was a partner; or (5) the receipt of a share of the profits of any business, in consideration of the sale of the goodwill of such business, does not of itself constitute the person so receiving a partner, or liable as such. But, in the event of the bankruptcy or insolvency of the trader, the lender of money on such terms, and the seller of the goodwill, are not entitled to recover the money lent, or the profits or interest due to them, till the claims of the other onerous creditors (c) of the trader have been satisfied (a).'

365. Plurality of Persons.—One person cannot make a partnership (a). But he may, contrary to the English rule (b), be a member of several partnerships without confounding their interests; nay, several persons may, by various combinations of their number, make distinct partnerships for separate objects (c). 'Not more than twenty persons can form a company for the purpose of carrying on any business (other than banking), that has for its object the acquisition of gain by the company or its members, nor more than ten persons for carrying on the business of banking, unless the company be registered under the Companies Act, or formed under some other Act of Parliament, or under Letters Patent (d).'

366. Term of Duration.—Partnership may be either for a fixed time; or indefinite in time, called a partnership at will.

367. A definite term may be fixed for the partnership, either by express limitation of time; or by reference to some event, or expected course of events, as the duration of a lease of premises. But such limitation must be clearly expressed; it will not be inferred from the mere purchase or existence of leasehold property to be used by the company (a). 'If the partnership is continued after the expiration of the term, without any new agreement, the original contract rights and duties of the partners remain the same as they were at the expiration of the term, so far as is consistent with the incidents of a partnership at will (b). A continuance of the business by the partners, or such of them as habitually acted therein during the term, without any settlement or liquidation of the partnership affairs, is presumed to be a continuance of the partnership (c).'

(c) Partnership Act, 1890, § 27 (2).

368. Partnership without any limitation of time may be dissolved at the will of the parties, or any of them; provided a fair, honest, and equitable discretion be observed, avoiding injury, or the taking of undue advantage (a).

(a) 3 Ersk. 3. § 26. 3 Pardessus, 158. See below, § 378. Partnership Act, 1890, § 26, 32.

369. Obligations of the Partners.—The partners are bound not only to each other, but to the public.

370. (1.) In relation to each other, and to the Company.—Each partner is debtor to the company for his share of stock unpaid, and liable to an action on that account. If the share to be contributed by a partner consist of a specific subject, the contract of partnership is only the titulus transferendi dominii; and without delivery the transference to the company is not complete, though, as in the common contract of sale, the risk is with the company. A partner becomes debtor to the company by drawing more of the profit than he is entitled to. He may become a creditor to the company by advancing money beyond his share (a); by allowing the profits to which he is entitled to remain undrawn; or a salary, or wages, or an allowance stipulated beyond his share of profit, to remain unpaid. A partner is bound to give his personal attention and services in the company affairs without recompense, unless it be otherwise stipulated (b); and this even in winding up a partnership dissolved by the death of a partner (c). He is bound to obey such calls as may be necessary to meet the losses and exigencies of the company (d); 'and to communicate to the company all benefit procured to himself in matters that naturally fall within the copartnership business, or from any use by him of the partnership property, name, or business connection (e). The recent Act provides further that if a partner, without the consent of the other partners, carries on any business of the same nature as and competing with that of the firm, he must account for and pay over to the firm all profits made by him in that business (f).'

(f) The Act, § 30.

371. (2.) In relation to Creditors.—The partners are liable for all debts established against the company (a). 'A partner is liable only for debts incurred after he becomes a member of the firm; and when a change occurs in a firm, the new firm and its incoming partner do not become answerable for debts of the old firm, even if the assets be taken over, unless the intention to do so be established by agreement express or implied. But where a new firm, formed by the assumption of a new partner, takes over the whole stock and business of a going concern, without any arrangement for winding up the old company's affairs, or for accounting, it may more readily be presumed to take over its liabilities also (b). The purchase of the business and assets of a firm, with an undertaking to pay present and future liabilities of the vendors, does not give a creditor of the vendors a direct claim against the purchasers, the creditor not being a party to the undertaking (c). So, on the principle of novation, the old firm and partners are not discharged until the creditor accepts the new firm as his debtors (d). A retiring partner may be discharged from existing liabilities by an agreement between himself and the members of the succeeding firm and the creditors, which agreement may be express or may be inferred from the course of dealing between the creditors and the new firm (e).'

'The partners' may be charged individually on decret or diligence directed against the firm (f). If their character as partners be denied, they may be entitled, according to circumstances, to have the charge suspended with or without caution (g). Each partner is universally liable to the creditors of the company, and cannot therefore, if he himself be a creditor of the company, enter into competition with the other creditors (h). But being liable individually only as guarantee of the company credit, he is entitled to relief against the company funds. And so in bankruptcy, the creditors of the company rank on the estate of the individual partners only for what is not paid from the company estate.

372. Dissolution of Partnership.—Partnership is dissolved differently in relation to the partners, and in relation to third parties.

373. (1.) Dissolution in relation to Partners.
—A distinction is to be marked between those events which eo ipso dissolve the partnership, and those which only afford a ground of dissolution.

Expiration of the term stipulated entitles the partners to separate without previous warning inter se; but it does not ipso facto dissolve the company (a). It still subsists, 'or rather may still subsist,' by tacit renewal (b); and as partnership may at the first be constituted by trading on a particular footing, so the continuance of a trade already begun is effectual to bind the parties on the same presumed terms, 'so far as they are not inconsistent with the implied terms of a partnership at will (c),' not for a stated period, as at the first, but as a partnership at will or without time (d).

(a) The contrary seems to be laid down by English writers (Collyer, 62; Smith, Merc. Law, 25); and also to be the law of France (Pothier, No. 139; 3 Pardessus, 140) and America (3 Kent, Com. 53).

374. The marriage of a female partner has in England 'and also in Scotland' been held to dissolve partnership, as otherwise a stranger would be introduced (a).

(a) Nerot v. Burnand, 4 Russ. 247; Collyer, 60; 28 R. R. 65. Russell v. Russell, 1874; 3 R. 93. But by the Married Women's Property Act, 1881 (44 and 45 Vict. c. 21), a wife's moveable estate is, by operation of law, vested in her as her separate estate; and it may be thought that marriage has not now the effect of dissolving a partnership of the wife. See Lindley, i. 85.

375. The death (a) of any of the partners eo ipso dissolves the partnership (b) (leaving the depending contracts to run their course) (c), unless heirs shall be expressly declared to be partners (d); or unless the contract shall be so conceived as necessarily to imply a right in heirs, as in a contract exceeding the term of human life (e). In such cases the heirs will have a right to be admitted as partners, and they may also be bound by taking up the succession: they cannot, of course, be compelled (if they do not represent) to become partners without their own consent (f).

(f) See M'Laren on Wills and Succession, ii. 307. Smith's Merc. Law, 28.

376. Insanity is only a ground of dissolution, not itself a dissolution of the contract. It may be distinguished as temporary or permanent. The former (as delirium, brain fever, etc.) seems to be no ground of dissolution, but a temporary interruption only of the acting or superintendence of the individual. The latter is a ground of dissolution, for the benefit of all concerned; of the person affected by the disease, as well as of the others. But, 'in the absence of special provisions in the contract,' partnership cannot on this ground be dissolved otherwise than by judicial authority, and the exercise of sound judicial discretion (a). 'Although in ordinary circumstances the insanity or incapacity of a partner operates a dissolution of the partnership, that result may be obviated by the terms of the contract, e.g. where they are such that the partner in question really performs his duty to the partnership by providing capital (b).'

(a) Sayer v. Bennet, 1 Cox, 107; 1 Montagu, 16; 1 Ill. 257. Waters v. Taylor, 2 Ves. & B. 303; Tudor, L. C. 329; 13 R. R. 91. Wrexham v. Huddleston, 1 Swan. 514, note. *Jones v. The Act, § 35 (a). When a judicial factor has been appointed to take charge of the lunatic partner's affairs, it would seem that the partnership may be closed by agreement, either by notice in terms of the contract or otherwise, the curator bonis applying to the Court of Session for special powers. See Ellis, Petr., 1836; 15 S. 262. Bontine's Cur., 1870; 8 Macph. 976. Acct. of Court v. Gilray's Cur. 1872; 10 Macph. 715. Clark on Partn. 661. If the partners and the judicial factor differ, a declaratory action or petition to the Court by either side is necessary.

(b) Eadie v. MacBean's Curator, 1888; 12 R. 660.

377. Insolvency (a) of a partner is a ground of dissolution: so is bankruptcy under the Act, 1696, c. 5 (b); such dissolution taking place by a distinct act of the other partners, or by judicial sentence. Sequestration of itself operates as a dissolution in Scotland; and so a commission of bankruptcy in England (c). In England it seems now to be settled that, on the issuing of the commission, the dissolution is held to have taken place with the act of bankruptcy (d). No decision on this point has been pronounced in Scotland.

378. Dissolution and Renunciation.—The act of the parties, mutual or individual, may dissolve the partnership in certain circumstances. Thus, by mutual consent, whether the appointed term have expired or not, the partnership may be dissolved. And by renunciation, 'after due notice (a),' one or more of the partners may retire, and so dissolve the company at a moment's notice, where there is no term fixed (b); or even where there is a term fixed, this may be done on just cause for separating being shown, 'such as fraud (c) of one of the copartners; or rash and reckless speculation, or unreasonable and impracticable behaviour of a gross kind in the conduct and business of the copartnership (d); or when a partner becomes liable to criminal prosecution (e); or is permanently disabled from performing his part of the contract, as by insanity (f), or bankruptcy and sequestration, or outlawry (g); or assigns his whole interest in the copartnership (see § 358); or because there is no longer a reasonable expectation of the joint adventure being profitable (h); or when the state of feeling between the partners has become such, that in the judgment of the Court mutual confidence between them is impossible; or when circumstances render it just and equitable to dissolve (i).' The former may be by extra-judicial, the latter will require a judicial act (k). But such renunciation must be fair; not for the acquisition of undue advantage; avoiding unnecessary injury; and with due notice, where notice does not increase the peril (l).

379. The effect of a Dissolution of partnership is different in various circumstances.

Death, etc.—The death of a partner, while it vests in the survivors the power and title to wind up the concern (a) (though without remuneration), gives to the heirs of the deceased partner his share of the stock, property, and goodwill, after the debts of the concern are provided for (b). As to the goodwill of a mercantile concern, doubts seem to have been entertained; but the approved doctrine seems to be, that if it be of a nature to go with the premises, it is saleable for the benefit of all concerned (c); that if personal (as in professional partnership), each partner is entitled, on dissolution of the partnership, to proceed with his own exertions, and the right of the survivor cannot be affected (d). Dissolution by death, or justifiable renunciation, entitles any partner, 'or the executor, but not a mere beneficiary or next of kin of the deceased partner (e),' to insist on immediately stopping the trade, and bringing the stock and establishment to a public sale (f).

Bankruptcy.—The effect of bankruptcy in dissolving a partnership, when the company itself is bankrupt, is to expose it to sequestration (g). When one or more partners as individuals become insolvent, and the partnership is dissolved in consequence, the right of the bankrupt partner vests in his creditors, and they can insist on the same course of proceeding as if the partner were dead.

380. The division of stock and profit on dissolution, after paying the debts, is to be made according to the stipulated shares. If there be no rate fixed, the presumption is for equality (a), which, however, may be altered by evidence, or circumstances from which another arrangement may fairly be inferred (b). The period of division is at the moment of dissolution, with the benefit or loss on impending transactions; and with liability for debt universally against all the partners, and relief according to their shares (c). 'If on the death of a partner, or his ceasing to be a partner, the surviving or remaining partners carry on the business with its capital or assets, and there be no special agreement regulating the rights of parties, and no settlement of accounts between partners and executors, and no option in the contract to surviving or remaining partners to buy the interest of the retiring or deceasing partner, or that option be not duly exercised in all material respects, that partner or his representatives are entitled in their option to the profits referable to his capital, or to payment of the capital and interest at five per cent. (d).'

381. (2.) Dissolution in relation to the Public. i. Act of Dissolution.—The partners cannot be discharged of their responsibility to third parties, unless the partnership be dissolved as between the partners.

382. ii. Notice.—Besides the act or sentence of dissolution, there must be Notice, in order to put an end to the contract and responsibility of the partners, in so far as the public is concerned (a). And if, after dissolution, one allow his name to remain over the shop or in the firm, he will continue to be liable for the debts of the company, or for bills drawn by the firm, if he have not taken effectual means to bring to a close the credit on which the public has relied (b). 'But it is further enacted that, where a person deals with a firm after a change in its constitution, he is entitled to treat all apparent members of the old firm as still being members of the firm (c). An advertisement in the Gazette is notice to all who had not dealings with the firm before the date of the dissolution or change (d). Any partner may publicly notify dissolution, and require the others to concur in all acts necessary for that purpose (e). Death, bankruptcy, and the retirement of a partner not known to any one dealing with the firm, dissolve the firm, and need no notice (f).'

383. The dissolution, whether by expiration of time or by mutual or partial act of the parties, must be communicated to the customers and to the public in order to affect third parties (a); 'the principle being, as in agency, that when a man has established an agency or a firm, and held himself out to others as liable for its debts, they have a right to assume that that liability continues till they have notice to the contrary (b). The effect of this principle, it has been held in England, is that a creditor has merely a right of election, in debts incurred before notice, as between a retired partner and those who continue to carry on the business and incur the debt (c). But this judgment rests on the theory of English law, that a partnership debt is due by each of the partners as joint, not as joint and several, contractors, and that a retired partner without notice is liable, not under a joint contract made subsequent to his retirement, but on the distinct and inconsistent principle of estoppel (d). That distinction appears to be inapplicable in Scots law, in which, although a personal exception on the ground of holding out might be said to operate against the retired partner, his liability is truly founded on a continuing guarantee, or joint and several liability (e) for the obligations of a firm which is a separate legal persona, the guarantee or liability not ceasing until he has duly intimated its termination (f). It has been held in England not to be necessary to give notice of dissolution by the death of a partner, in order to free his representatives from future liabilities (g). In Scotland a case occurred in which the Court avoided any decision on this general question (h); 'but it is now fixed that notice of dissolution by death or bankruptcy, which are public facts, is not required for this purpose in the case either of a firm or a joint-stock company (i).'

384. In giving notice, there is a difference between that which is requisite for those who have dealt with the company and for the public generally.

To Customers who have dealt with the company, and for the purpose of changing the credit on which the company has actually proceeded, notice must be given,—either by letter; or by personal communication; or by change of the firm, or of the name in the notes and cheques of a banking-house; or by evidence of a newspaper advertisement having been actually read by the party. It is not enough to show an advertisement in the Gazette or in the newspapers, with a possibility or even probability of the advertisement having been read by the party (a).

387. Winding up the Concern.—To one effect the partnership continues to subsist, notwithstanding dissolution, i.e. for the winding up of the concern, and terminating all the responsibilities of the company. No new debts can be contracted, but only the funds made effectual for answering the demands (a). If special stipulation be made as to winding up, and any special powers given for that purpose, they will be effectual (b). If no arrangement have been made for winding up, the surviving or solvent partners are entitled to act (c); or if any just cause of objection be stated against them (d), 'or if all the partners are dead or incapable (e), the partnership estate will be sequestrated, and 'a neutral person will be judicially appointed to wind up (f). If sequestration be necessary, it is competent on the petition of the surviving partners (g). The partners will be liable for the expense of an unsuccessful attempt to enforce a debt alleged to be due to the company; and the surviving partners alone have the title to pursue for debts due to the company (h).

But there is sometimes a stipulation that the shares of retiring or deceased partners shall be regulated by the immediately preceding 'periodical' balance; which is to be taken as the rule, provided 'that the system of periodical balances' have been acted on by the parties (b). 'Such signed balance-sheets are binding on the partners, and can be corrected only on showing an error calculi, or some palpable error that may be detected by examination of the balance-sheets themselves (c).'

390A. 'Statutory Rules for Distribution of Assets.—Subject to any agreement,—1. Losses, including losses and deficiencies of capital, shall be paid first out of profits, next out of capital, and lastly, if necessary, by the partners individually in the proportion in which they were entitled to share profits.

'2. The assets of the firm, including the sums contributed by the partners to make up losses or deficiencies of capital, shall be applied in the following manner and order:—(1) In paying firm liabilities to persons not partners; (2) in repaying to each partner rateably advances by him to the firm as distinguished from capital; (3) in paying to each partner rateably his capital; (4) the residue shall be divided as profits are divisible (a).

'Where a partnership contract has been rescinded for fraud or misrepresentation of one of the parties thereto, the party entitled to rescind, without prejudice to any other right, is entitled—(1) to retention of the surplus assets for any sum paid by him for his share in the firm and for any capital contributed by him; (2) to stand in the place of the creditors for any payments made by him in respect of the partnership liabilities; (3) to be indemnified by the person guilty of the fraud or misrepresentation against all the firm's debts or liabilities (b).'

391. Arbitration.—An obligation to refer 'disputes' to arbitration 'was till 3rd July 1894' effectual only if the arbiter or referee 'were' named. And so an agreement to refer 'to neutral persons' 'did' not bar judicial proceedings (a); and an agreement to refer to the person who 'should' hold a certain office when a dispute 'should' arise (as the Lord Advocate or Solicitor-General for the time) 'was' not binding (b). 'But a clause of arbitration which is necessary for adjusting a condition, or liquidating or extricating a part of the contract—which is, in other words, a condition precedent to the bringing of any action—is and was effectual, although arbiters are not named (c); and contrary to the rule which holds in regard to references which are independent contracts (d), such executorial or ancillary references do not fall by the death of a party (e).

'The Arbitration (Scotland) Act, 1894,

enacts that an agreement to refer to an unnamed arbiter, or to a person to be named by another person, or to one described as the holder for the time being of any office or appointment, shall not for that reason only be invalid (f). It is also provided that, on the failure to nominate an arbiter or one of two arbiters, the Lord Ordinary or Sheriff having jurisdiction may nominate such arbiter, and may also, on the failure of arbiters to agree upon an oversman, nominate an oversman (g). Arbiters have always power to nominate an oversman, unless the agreement to refer provides otherwise (h).'

II. JOINT ADVENTURE OR JOINT TRADE.

392. Description and Constitution.—Joint adventure or joint trade is a limited partnership, confined to a particular adventure, speculation, course of trade, or voyage; and in which the partners, either latent or known, use no firm or social name, and incur no responsibility beyond the limits of the adventure (a). It is to be established by the same evidence as partnership (b). It is not to be inferred from joint ownership in a ship, unless there has been participation in the mercantile employment of the ship in which the joint adventure is said to have consisted (c).

'Although joint adventure has been recognised as something distinct from partnership by very recent authorities (d), it is difficult to show in what it differs from proper partnership. The distinction is not recognised in England (e), and Mr. Bell himself points out (f) that Lord Eldon said (g), "A joint adventure is as proper a partnership as any other."

(g) Davison v. Robertson, 1815; 8 Dow, 218. Mr. Bell says (2 Com. 649; 539, M'L's ed.): "The great peculiarity in the doctrine of joint trade is, that unless where the joint concern is avowed, and a credit raised on the combined responsibility, the liability being the result of the discovery of a partnership which was not relied on as regulating the credit, the limits of the contract are fixed by the actual agreement between the parties."

393. Joint purchase is also to be distinguished from joint trade, as there is in it no partnership (a).

(a) Hoare v. Dawes, 1780; Doug. 356; 1 Ill. 249. Neilson v. M'Dougal, 1682; M. 14,551.

394. A company may be party to a joint adventure; and this to the effect of introducing a preference in favour of the creditors of the adventure over the creditors of the proper company, as to the capital embarked in the joint adventure (a).

(a) Crooks v. Tawse, 1779; M. 14,596; 1 Ill. 240.

395. The Liability of the joint adventurers is governed by these rules:—Where goods are purchased 'or money raised' for the joint adventure, 'and the dealing, though ostensibly by an individual, is truly and substantially a dealing of the joint adventure,' the adventurers are liable as partners (a). But there is no such responsibility for goods, etc., purchased 'on the credit of an individual adventurer' previously to the contract, though afterwards brought into stock 'as his contribution' (b). The responsibility is limited to the adventure (c).

396. The Stock of the concern is common property, and (as in partnership proper) is held in trust for the creditors of the concern (a). 'At the close of the adventure each partner has a title to sue the treasurer or intromitter for his share of stock and profits (b).'

The shares of the adventurers are presumed, as in partnership, to be equal, but capable of being otherwise arranged (c).

Implied Mandate.—In dealings within the limits of the concern, each partner is præpositus negotiis societatis (d); but he has no implied mandate to bind the partners generally.

III. JOINT-STOCK COMPANIES.

397. General View of Joint-Stock Companies.—The great public benefit resulting from encouragements and facilities to the investment of capital in joint-stock companies for the prosecution of undertakings requiring capital beyond the means and enterprise of an individual, has given great interest to the law applicable to such arrangements. In English practice, many technical difficulties were found to oppose themselves to the free investment of capital in this way; while in Scotland, under a system of jurisprudence which more readily adapts itself to such emergencies, few obstacles of this kind arose. The difficulties to be overcome were these: that in England the company could not sue or be sued without the names of all the partners; that the partners could not sue each other for a company matter, without necessarily including a dissolution; that the shares were not assignable to the effect of freeing the retiring partner; that creditors could not certainly know against whom to apply; and that the responsibility of each was for the whole debts of the concern. In Scotland none of these objections occurred or were formidable, and the unlimited responsibility of the partners was doubted (a), 'though now it has been firmly established as a principle of the common law for more than a century (b).' But the doubts occurring as to such associations in England led to the same general understanding as to the precautions to be taken in both parts of the island.

The matter 'was afterwards,' however, regulated by a general statute, applicable to the whole empire, passed on the report to the House of Commons on the state of the law relative to partnership, 14th July 1837 (c); 'which has been superseded by other Acts of Parliament to be afterwards noticed (d).'

(b) See Clark on Partnership, 286. Limited liability, however, may exist not only by charter, Act of Parliament, or registration under the Companies Acts (infra, § 403c seq.), but also by contract, as where a person takes a policy of insurance from a company binding the proprietors only to the amount of their shares. 25 and 26 Vict. c. 89, § 38 (6). *In re Athenæum Ins. (d) See § 403A et seq.

398. At Common Law. (1.) Nature.—

Under the common law, a joint-stock company is contradistinguished from ordinary partnership (a), by the administration being vested in certain officers or directors elected by the company, and made known to the public by advertisement or otherwise (b)—the individual partners having no power as propositi negotiis societatis to deal with the public; and by the shares being transferable according to a mode prescribed by the contract.

(a) Cf. Dove v. Young, 1868; 7 Macph. 304.

(b) See as to their power to bind the partners by bills, Dickinson v. Valpy, 10 B. & Cr. 128; 1 Ill. 266; 34 R. R. 348. See above, § 321; below, § 403L.

399. (2.) Title to Sue.—'Until the Companies Act of 1862' joint-stock companies 'were' in Scotland held lawful, however numerous the parties (a). And although a joint-stock company cannot in Scotland sue or be sued by the descriptive name, as a private partnership may by its firm (b); and although the partners cannot, by subscribing that name, bind the company; the company have been allowed to sue or be sued by the descriptive name, with the addition of the names of all or some of the partners (c). 'A company debt must be sued for in the company name, with joinder of partners (the company being unincorporated or unregistered), even when the company has ceased to carry on business and is being wound up (d).'

400. (3.) Transfer of Shares.—The shares of stock may be transferred, if it be so stipulated in the contract. It is usual to require certain precautions or conditions for completing the transference of the share;—to provide that, before transferring a share, the first offer shall be made to the company, or that the transfer shall be made in presence of so many directors, etc. These are held to be intended for the benefit and security of the company, and must, in order to complete the transference, and change the responsibility, as in a question with the company, 'unless waived by them (a),' be observed (b); but the completion of the bargain and sale, as between the buyer and seller of the share, will, in a question between them, entitle the seller to relief against the buyer, although the company regulations have not yet been complied with (c). In order to discharge the seller of the share from his liability to the creditors of the company for future dealings, he 'is not in general required to' give notice of his retirement; 'but he must have ceased to be a partner, and his name must be removed from the register of shareholders (d). By statute, contracts for the sale of shares in joint-stock banking companies are void, unless the numbers by which the shares are distinguished are set forth in the contract; or if there is no register by numbers, then the name of the registered proprietor at the time of the contract (e).'

401. Public Chartered Companies.—These companies are of two kinds,—those which hold the character of a corporation, with a privilege of limited responsibility under a royal charter; and those which enjoy a privilege of monopoly under legislative authority.

402. A royal charter enables a company to hold lands, make bye-laws, enjoy the other privileges of a corporation, and trade under a limited responsibility. The shares of such a company are transferable; the company is undissolved by the death or bankruptcy of a partner; and the management and title to pursue are in the officers appointed according to the charter (a).

(a) See as to corporations, below, § 2176 sq.

403. To give the privilege of monopoly there must be an Act of Parliament, as in the case of the East India Company.

403A. 'After various attempts had been made to regulate joint-stock companies, to facilitate their formation by enabling the Crown to incorporate by letters patent (a), and to produce uniformity in the constitution, government, and powers of companies formed by special Acts of Parliament for the construction of railways, canals, harbours, and other works of public utility (b), the Act 7 and 8 Vict. c. 110—the first general Joint-Stock Companies Act—established a general registry for such companies, and a code of rules both for their formation and their government (c). It was superseded by the Joint-Stock Companies Act, 1856 (d), which continued in force, though amended and varied (e), till 1862, when a statute was passed to consolidate and amend "the laws relating to the incorporation, regulation, and winding up of trading companies and other associations" (f). This Act extends of necessity to all companies formed and registered under the statutes last mentioned (g), and to all banking companies of more than ten persons, and other companies consisting of more than twenty persons, formed after Nov. 2, 1862, for the acquisition of gain. All other companies, except railway companies incorporated by statute, and unregistered companies consisting of fewer than seven persons, may register themselves as companies with limited or unlimited liability under its provisions (h). Another statute makes similar provisions for the regulation of industrial and provident societies (i); while the leading statute has been amended by Acts passed to give additional security to creditors and shareholders, chiefly in conformity with the recommendations of a Committee of the House of Commons appointed after the panic of 1866 (k).'

403B. 'The Prospectus is a statement of the purposes, capital, etc., of a proposed company, issued by the promoters. It is the basis on which the original shareholders agree to take shares; and while some allowance is to be made for sanguine expectations, the law requires that it shall be characterised by the utmost candour and honesty (a). And it is required by statute that every prospectus or notice inviting persons to subscribe for shares in any joint-stock company shall specify any contract entered into by the company, promoters, directors, or trustees; and if it fail to do so, it is to be deemed fraudulent on the part of the promoters, directors, or trustees knowingly issuing it, as regards any person taking shares on the faith of such prospectus and not having notice of the contract (b).

'An original (c) shareholder who has been misled by a material misstatement or concealment in a prospectus, may be relieved from his agreement to take shares. With this view he may either repudiate the shares, if the company seeks to make him liable, provided he do so promptly after notice of the fraud, and before he has taken any benefit from his shares, and have in due time given notice to the company of his repudiation (d); or he may claim restoration of moneys paid, if he is in a position to restore the shares, and place all parties in the same position as they were (e); or he may, but only in case of fraud, recover damages, not against the company afterwards formed (f), but against the promoters, or those who have imposed upon him (g). The decision in Peck v. Derry led to the passing of the Directors Liability Act, 1890, by which directors and promoters are liable to make compensation to all who are deceived into subscribing for shares by untrue statements in a prospectus or notice or relative document which they have authorised, subject to the conditions in the Act (h).

'But as one may not at once approbate and reprobate, he cannot, when induced to take shares by misrepresentations of an existing company itself through its agents, recover damages against the company while remaining a member of it. He must rescind his contract to take shares and withdraw from the company before he can claim damages (i). If the memorandum of association, contract, or deed of settlement materially differs from the prospectus, one who has taken shares on the faith of the prospectus may at once repudiate them and claim his deposit, and get the register rectified (k).

'But creditors of the company who trust to the register have a right to look to him; and if the company is wound up, whether voluntarily or by or under the supervision of the Court, or if it stop payment and a meeting to resolve on liquidation be called before he has taken steps to have his name removed from the register, he loses his right to avoid the contract, and will be a contributory (l). A shareholder is bound to make himself acquainted with the memorandum and articles of association within a reasonable time; and as other parties may be induced to take shares on the faith of his name, he will not be allowed, even in a question with the going company, to get rid of liability on the ground of misrepresentation or fraud, if he fail to take steps to have his name removed (m). A "promoter" is accountable to a company for money secretly obtained by him, e.g. as commission from a vendor to it, just as if he stood towards it in the relation of agent or trustee at the time when the money was obtained (n).'

403c. 'Formation of Companies — Memorandum of Association.—All companies formed since 1862 (a) may, if consisting of seven or more persons, and must, if consisting of more than ten members, and being banking companies, or of more than twenty, being formed for the purpose of carrying on any other business (than banking) that has for its object the acquisition of gain (b), be formed subject to the provisions of the Act of 1862. Companies which ought to be, and are not registered under the Act (§ 4, 6, 17, etc.), are illegal and cannot sue for their debts (c).

'Companies are divided by the Act into three classes: 1. Companies limited by shares; 2. Companies limited by guarantee; and 3. Companies with unlimited liability. The partners of the proposed company sign a memorandum of association, which contains the name of the company, the part of the United Kingdom where the registered office is to be, and the objects of the company. By signing it they agree to become members; and being entered on the register, are deemed members (d). Where the liability of the partners is to be limited by shares, the memorandum must also contain a declaration of limited liability, and must state the amount of proposed capital divided into shares of a fixed amount. If the liability is limited by guarantee, there is a declaration that if the company be wound up, each member will contribute to the liquidation of its debts whatever may be required, not exceeding a fixed amount (e). The memorandum of association must be signed by at least seven members, each signature being attested by at least one witness. Each member must take at least one share, and write the number he takes opposite his name in the memorandum (f). It requires the same stamp as if it were a deed (g). The liability of the directors or manager of a company otherwise limited, may be unlimited (h). Joint-stock banks of issue registered as limited companies are not entitled to limited liability in respect of their notes (i). The liability of persons signing the contract or memorandum can only be limited in the statutory way, not by any private arrangement. Thus, trustees having part of their trust estate invested in shares of a company, and being registered as partners, cannot escape from full personal liability as partners, either in a question with creditors of the company or in the way of relief to their copartners, by reason of their being mere trustees, and described as trustees in the register and books of the company (k). The same rule applies to executors accepting the shares of their testator and entered on the register of partners (l); but the statute permits a transfer of the interest of a deceased member of a company by his "personal representative," although such personal representative may not himself be a member; i.e. he may sell the shares and obtain the transfer directly to the purchaser (m). But when one holds shares of a company as a trustee or executor, it has been held that on his death his liability, except as to obligations already incurred, ceases, and his title and interest in the shares does not pass to his personal representatives, but accrues to his surviving co-trustees (n). So also the liability of shareholders cannot be restricted by issuing shares at a discount (o).

403D. 'Articles of Association—Registration.—The memorandum of association is registered with the Registrar of Joint-Stock Companies. If the company is limited by shares, printed articles of association, stamped and signed by each member in presence of one attesting witness, containing regulations for the company in numbered paragraphs, may, and in the case of other companies must, be delivered to the registrar along with the memorandum. Companies limited by shares are regulated by the articles given in Table A appended to the Act, so far as they are applicable and are not excluded or modified by the registered articles (a). That table may be altered as to future companies by the Board of Trade (b).

403E. 'The memorandum and articles, if any, bind the subscribers; and on registration and payment of the fees, the registrar certifies that the company is incorporated, and in the case of a limited company that it is limited. The partners thereupon become a corporate body (a), with perpetual succession, a common seal, and power to hold lands. But its rights and powers as a corporation are limited by its memorandum of association; and as the Act has regard not merely to the interests of the existing shareholders, but to those of persons who may become shareholders in succession, as well as of the outside public, a company registered under it is disabled from entering into a contract or doing any act foreign to its purposes as defined by the memorandum, even with the assent or homologation of all its members (b), or although permitted by the articles of association (c). 'An incorporated association's assets are its property, and not the property of the shareholders for the time being; and if the directors misapply the assets to purposes for which the company itself cannot lawfully use them, they are liable as soon as any one properly puts the company in motion (d).

'The registrar's certificate is conclusive (e) evidence that the requisitions of the Act (not being conditions precedent of registration, such, e.g., as the signature of the memorandum by seven partners) with regard to registration have been complied with (f). Changes can be made on the memorandum after registration under certain conditions specified in the statute, for the purpose of increasing capital, conversion of shares into stock, or of shares into shares of larger amount, or of change of name (g); and, subject to the provisions of the Act, and the conditions contained in the memorandum of association, the company may, by special resolution, passed by three-fourths of the members present, and subsequently confirmed by a majority, vary the articles of association in regard to the management, but not the constitution of the company, including the fundamental right of members to the share of profits originally provided. The power to issue preference shares, if not at first authorised, is thus excluded (h). By a subsequent statute, a company is enabled under an order of the Court to have the capital reduced; but no resolution reducing the capital can come into operation till an order of Court confirming the reduction is registered (i). It is now settled that the purchase of its own shares by a company is ultra vires, although authorised by its articles of association; and even if such a power, or a power to issue shares at a discount, is found in the memorandum, it is void, as being virtually a reduction of capital, and a violation of a statutory condition of the memorandum (k). Somewhat more extensive powers to alter the memorandum are given by the Companies Act of 1890 (l).'

paid (d). By § 25 of the Act of 1867 (30 and 31 Vict. c. 131), every share in a company is deemed and taken to have been issued and held subject to payment of the whole amount thereof in cash, unless otherwise determined by a contract in writing, filed with the registrar at or before its issue (e).

'If the capital be not divided into shares, the names, addresses, and occupations of the directors are kept in a register, a copy of which, and notification of any change, must be sent to the registrar (f). In companies whose capital is divided into shares, an annual list of members, with various particulars required by the statute, must also, under severe penalties, be made up, entered in a separate part of the register, and a copy of it sent to the registrar. Notice of changes in the amount of shares, or conversion of capital, must also be sent to the registrar (g). The register is prima facie evidence of all matters directed to be inserted in it (h). If (1) any name be entered in or omitted from the register without sufficient cause, or if (2) default or unnecessary delay take place in removing any person's name from the register, he, or any member, or the company itself, may apply to the Court of Session by summary petition for an order to rectify the register. The Court in this proceeding may decide any question of title or question necessary for the rectification of the register (i). But where serious or complicated questions apart from the mere rectification of the register are raised between the parties, it will require them to bring an appropriate action in lieu of this summary remedy (k). In the case of companies registered in England or Ireland, no notice of any trust, express, implied, or constructive, can be entered on the register or received by the registrar (l). In Scotland, there is a practice of noticing trusts in the transfer and registration of stocks, but it does not affect the personal liability of the trustees (m). A notice of an equitable assignment of shares in security of a debt is not a notice of a trust within the meaning of this clause (n).'

(a) Notice of the situation of this office, and of any change, must be given to the registrar. 25 and 26 Vict. c. 89, § 39, 40. 46 and 47 Vict. c. 30 (Companies' Colonial Registers Act, 1883) provides for branch registers of members in colonies where companies transact business.

403G. 'Name of Company—Register of Mortgages, etc.—No company may be registered by the same name as an existing company, unless that company be in the course of dissolution and consents (a). Every limited company, besides having the word "limited" (and "reduced" for a certain time after a reduction in the capital has taken place) last in its name, must have its name affixed on the outside of every office or place where its business is carried on. Its name must also be engraved on the company's seal, and be mentioned in all notices, advertisements, bills, notes, indorsements, cheques, and orders for money or goods, bills of parcels, receipts, and letters of credit. Not only the company, but also its officers are liable for default in these matters; any officer making such default being personally liable for the amount of any such bill, etc., if not duly paid (b). Limited companies are also bound to keep registers, open to the inspection of creditors and members, of all mortgages and charges specifically affecting their property (c); and, while a mortgage or debenture is not void by reason that it is not duly registered (d), directors and officials are subject to penalties for permitting the omission of such entries. But the rule of construction for some time established in England, that such officials, being bound to see that the law is obeyed, are personally disqualified from enforcing a charge which is not registered, so long as it stands in their persons (e), is now negatived, at least in cases where there is no concealment (f). Limited banking and insurance companies (g), and deposit and benefit societies, must post in a conspicuous place in their registered and branch offices, and places of business, a statement of their liabilities and assets, the amount of capital and shares, etc., and must give a copy to every member and creditor of the company on payment of sixpence (h).'

403H. 'Directors, etc.—The number, qualification, and powers of directors are generally defined by the articles of association. Generally speaking, they are the agents of the company, and bind it in all matters within the scope of their authority. Persons dealing with the directors or agents of the company are bound to acquaint themselves with the published constitution of the company, and the limits imposed by the deed of settlement or articles on the authority of the directors, but not with bye-laws or private limitations or instructions; and strangers are entitled to assume that the company business in regard to notices of meetings, resolutions, etc., is duly and regularly performed (a):

'The management of the company's affairs is confided to the directors, and they are under stringent obligations to perform their duties with diligence and integrity. Courts of Equity will entertain complaints against them at the instance of shareholders, and will restrain illegal or ultra vires acts, and require them to account (b), subject to the general rule that the company itself is the proper pursuer to recover its own money or property, and that the shareholder must first exhaust the means of redress provided by the constitution of the company (c); and they are liable to make good to shareholders losses incurred by their breach of trust or gross negligence (d).

'A director is, strictly speaking, a managing partner and not a trustee (e); yet, as in a sense he holds a fiduciary position, no director can take any benefit by dealing on behalf of the company with himself or any firm of which he is a partner (f); and he may be compelled to make over to the company any benefits so acquired for himself (g). Nor is he entitled to payment for work done for the company, unless there is a special contract for remuneration (h). The Court in a winding up has power to compel directors or managers to refund moneys misapplied, and to assess damages for misapplication or retention of the company's moneys, for misfeasance or breach of trust (i).

'They may also be made liable to third parties for loss in dealings with their company in consequence of material misrepresentations in fact made by them (k). And like other agents professing to bind their principals in matters beyond their powers, they are held to warrant their authority, and may be sued, not on the contract which they have made, but for damages for breach of the implied promise or warranty (l).'

403I. 'Calls.—One of the most important powers of the directors is that of making calls, i.e. of requiring from shareholders payment of moneys due by them in respect of their shares. The liability of shareholders to calls depends on the deed of settlement, or the memorandum or articles of association (a). Under the Companies Act, and in most special Acts, the register is prima facie evidence of membership; and in any action for calls it is enough to allege that the defender is a member of the company, and indebted in respect of a call or other moneys due, whereby right of action has accrued to the company (b). If calls be unpaid, the directors are generally empowered to declare the shares forfeited, but only where such power is expressly given by the regulations of the company, and the power given must be exercised with the strictest accuracy in complying with all conditions (c). In a judicial or voluntary winding up, the Court of Session may, on production by the liquidators of a signed list of contributories, stating the sums due by each, and the date when they became due, pronounce decree against such contributories without notice, to the same effect as if they had severally consented to registration, for execution on a charge of six days, of a legal obligation for payment of such calls and interest (d).'

403J. 'Transfer of Shares.—Companies registered under the earlier Joint-Stock Companies Acts may cause their shares to be transferred in the manner formerly in use, or in such other manner as the company may direct; and the shares of members of companies formed under the Act of 1862 may be transferred in the manner provided by the company's regulations (a). Unless express power is reserved to the directors to reject a proposed transfer, they have no discretion in the matter, a member having an absolute right to transfer his shares to any one he pleases, provided only the transfer be real and not merely nominal, and there be no trust or reservation of benefit to the transferor (b). In general, it is not till the transferee's name is placed on the register that he becomes a member, and the vendor's liability ceases (c). Under the Companies Acts, a company is required to register the transferee on the application of the transferor (d). In practice, a transfer should be accompanied by the share certificates; but even if it be, the company may delay registering the transfer for a reasonable time for inquiry (e). The company by issuing a share certificate is barred from denying that the person named in it is owner of the shares; and if the company cannot give the shares and register his transferee, it is liable in damages (f).

403K. 'Liability of Shareholders.—Partners of joint-stock companies begin to be liable for its contracts and deeds only with the commencement of the company. They are not liable for contracts made before that time by the promoters, while the preliminaries are not completed, unless they become so by express adoption or acquiescence (a). When the partnership has begun, which in the case of registered companies takes place at registration (b), the partners are liable for all contracts with third parties made by its directors or agents in the usual course of business (c); but not, of course, for acts not sanctioned by the constitution of the company (ultra vires) (d). Members of a registered company are of course not liable as individuals upon the company's obligations beyond the amount of their shares if not paid up, or of their guarantee, except in the event of the company carrying on business for more than six months after the number of members is less than seven (e).

'Bills and Notes granted by Companies.—A company cannot be bound by bills or notes, unless express authority to issue them in its name be given in the articles of association or deed of settlement, or the granting of such obligations be usual and necessary in the business carried on by the company (a). A bill or note is validly made, accepted, or indorsed by a company registered under the Act of 1862, if it is made, accepted, or indorsed in the name of the company, or by, on behalf, or on account of the company, by any person acting under its authority (b), provided always the company have power by its constitution to issue negotiable instruments (c).

403M. 'Winding up of Companies.—Many Acts, passed to facilitate the winding up and dissolution of companies, are superseded by the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1886, the latter of which applies to the liquidation of companies certain provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, as to the ranking of claims and to diligence (a). All companies registered under the Act of 1862 may be wound up under it, whether formed under it or not (b). Also all companies registered under the former Acts (c), and all other partnerships and companies consisting of more than seven members, may be wound up under the Act, but not voluntarily (d); except railway companies incorporated by Act of Parliament, and not falling within the operation of the Abandonment of Railways Act, 1850, as revived and amended by the later statutes on that subject (e). Provision is made for winding up industrial and provident societies and benefit building societies under the Companies Acts, the jurisdiction being in the Sheriff Court (f).'

403N. 'Winding up of Unregistered Companies.—In the winding up of unregistered companies, every one who is liable to contribute to the liabilities of the company, to the adjustment of the rights of members, or to costs, is a contributory to the extent of such liability; or in the event of the death or bankruptcy of a contributory, or the marriage of a female contributory, the personal representatives, trustee, or husband are liable in terms of the provisions of the Act in regard to them (a). After the petition for winding up has been presented, and before an order, the Court may, on the application of any creditor, stay proceedings against any contributory or the company, and diligence against the company is void; and after an order no such proceedings for a company debt can be begun or continued without leave of the Court (b). By the order for winding up, or a subsequent order, the property and estates of the company may be vested in the liquidators, who may then, after finding such security as the Court requires, raise and defend all actions necessary for realising the effects of the company (c). When the company's affairs have been completely wound up, the Court makes an order that the company be dissolved (d). Winding up may be ordered by the Court of Session in the case of an unregistered company when it is dissolved, or has ceased to carry on business, or is carrying it on only for the purpose of winding up; whenever it is unable to pay its debts; or when the Court thinks it just and equitable that it should be wound up (e).'

403O. 'Winding up of Registered Companies.—Registered companies are wound up—1st, by the Court; 2nd, voluntarily by the company; or, 3rd, voluntarily under the supervision of the Court. It is incompetent to sequester the estates of a registered company under the Bankruptcy Act (a). Winding up may be ordered by the Court of Session, when a special resolution has been passed to that effect; when the company does not begin business for a year from its incorporation, or suspends business for a year; when the membership is reduced below seven; when it cannot pay its debts (which in Scotland means when the company neglects for more than three weeks, after service of a formal demand under the creditor's hand, to pay or satisfy a debt of more than £50, whenever the induciae of a charge have expired without payment having been made, or when it is proved to the satisfaction of the Court that it is unable to pay its debts (b)); when the Court is of opinion that it is just and equitable that it should be wound up (c). Although the last clause can be properly applied only to cases ejusdem generis with the cases preceding, it has been liberally interpreted to include a power to wind up where the intended business has become practically impossible, as by the failure of the title to a mine, or the failure to obtain a patent (d).'

403P. 'Petition for Winding up, and Effect.—

Winding up by the Court proceeds on a petition by the company, or a creditor, or a contributory (subject to certain limitations (a)), or by all or any of these (b). After the winding up has begun, and indeed from the date of "stopping payment" or of declared and irretrievable insolvency (c), all dispositions of the company's property, and alterations in the status of members, and all transfers of shares, are void, unless the Court orders otherwise (d); and as all the creditors have then acquired a title and interest to enforce the personal liability of all shareholders on the register, it is too late for any shareholder to rescind his contract to take shares for fraud of the company (e). All proceedings may be stayed, and an interim liquidator may be appointed (f). Until a liquidator is appointed, the company's property is held to be in the custody of the Court, which may order inspection of the papers by a contributory or creditor (g). After an order for winding up, actions and proceedings against the company can only be proceeded with by leave of the Court (h). The winding up may be stayed on the motion of a contributory or creditor, and meetings of the creditors and contributories may be held in order to ascertain their wishes, to which, when proved by sufficient evidence, the Court may have regard (i). In order to determine the validity of conveyances, mortgages, etc., of the company's property, the date of presentation of the petition for winding up is equivalent to bankruptcy (k).

403Q. 'The Official Liquidator or Liquidators are appointed and removed, and their powers, remuneration, and the amount of security to be found by them, are fixed by the Court (a); or, with certain limitations, by the Lord Ordinary to whom the liquidation is remitted, or in vacation by the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (b). Under the sanction of the Court, or by special order without the sanction or intervention of the Court, they may appoint solicitors or law agents to assist them; compromise all claims by or against the company (c); sue and defend in its name; carry on its business so far as necessary for the beneficial winding up of the company (d); sell its property; and do all other things, including the making and indorsing of bills, necessary for winding up the company and distributing its assets (e). The liquidator differs from the trustee in a sequestration, in being merely administrator for the company, in which its property is still vested, while the trustee has an independent title to the bankrupt estate, which is absolutely vested in him (f). The liquidator is bound by the company's constitution and its acts and deeds; and so, for instance, where the shares are said, in the articles and memorandum and certificate of registration granted to bond fide purchasers of shares, to be entirely or to a great extent paid up, he is not entitled, in settling the list of contributories, to make such a purchaser liable beyond the amount, if any, so stated to be payable (g).

403R. 'Contributories.—The ascertainment of the contributories, or the persons liable for the debts of the company, is the most important part of the proceedings in a winding up. After the order for winding up has been made, the Court settles a list of contributories, distinguishing those who are so in their own names, and those who are so as representing others (a). In doing so, the Court may rectify the register of members (b). We have seen that after winding up begins it is too late to rectify the register on the ground of the company's fraud in inducing a person to take shares (c). But in a winding up one may have his name removed from the register on the ground that he was incapable of contracting, e.g. as a pupil (d), that he had never agreed to be a partner or shareholder (e), or had agreed under a condition prestatable by the company that had not been fulfilled (f), or that his shares had been forfeited (g), or regularly and validly transferred to another who should, and, but for the company's delay or default, would have been registered in respect of them (h). On the other hand, the Court will rectify the register by putting upon it the names of persons who have agreed to take shares, either originally (i), or upon a transfer (k), or whose names have been improperly removed from it (l).

'In the case of a registered company, it is the present and past members, or their representatives, who become contributories. When the company is not limited, or when the full amount of the shares is not paid up, each of these members, or his representatives, becomes liable, by being placed on this list, to contribute to such an amount as may be required for payment of debts, costs of winding up, and adjustment of the rights of the contributories inter se; but no past member is bound to contribute if he has ceased to be a member a year before the winding up began, or in respect of any liability incurred after he ceased to be a member, or if the present members are able to make up the contributions required, or in a limited company beyond the amount unpaid on his share (m).'

City of Glasgow Bk.*, 1878; 6 R. 420; aff. ib. H. L. 66; 4 App. Ca. 624. The rule is that a man is not relieved from being a contributory by selling his shares, if owing either to his own neglect or that of his transferee, or to any cause except the delay or default of the company, the transferee's name has not been substituted for his at the time of the winding up. Per Giffard, V.-C., in *Marshall v. 403s. 'No one can be made to contribute to the liabilities of a company limited by shares, or by guarantee, beyond the amount unpaid on the shares, or the shares and guarantee, except that the partners of a limited banking company are liable for the amount of notes issued, over and above their limited liability for the other obligations of the company (a). Policies of insurance and other contracts may restrict the liability of partners, or restrict the obligation to the funds of the company (b). The debt of a contributory arises when the liability commences, but it is payable only when calls are made. So, in the event of his bankruptcy during the subsistence of the winding up, the liquidator may claim for the estimated value of his liability to future calls, and his trustee becomes a contributory in the winding up (c). Various provisions are made with regard to sums due by the company to its members, and the pleading of compensation thereon (d), the adjustment of the rights of contributories inter se (e), the enforcement of orders, and the payment of calls. When the winding up is concluded, the Court orders the dissolution of the company, which is reported by the liquidator to the registrar. When it is minuted by the registrar, the company is dissolved (f).'

403r. 'Voluntary Winding up (a) may take place—1st, when the period of duration fixed by the articles of association expires, or the event occurs upon which, under such articles, dissolution is to take place, and the company has passed a resolution requiring it to be voluntarily wound up; 2nd, when the company has passed a special resolution requiring it to be voluntarily wound up; 3rd, when it has passed an extraordinary resolution that it cannot, by reason of its liabilities, continue its business, and that it is advisable to wind it up (b). A voluntary winding up commences at the date of the resolution authorising it (c). After the resolution, the company can only carry on its business so far as necessary for the purpose of winding up; and transfers of shares are invalid without the sanction of the liquidators; but it retains the status of a corporation till the conclusion of the winding up (d). The resolution being intimated in the Gazette, liquidators are appointed, and their remuneration fixed, at a general meeting, or by the creditors or a committee of creditors, under an extraordinary resolution to that effect (subject to a power of removal by the Court on motion by a contributory); a list of contributories, which is prima facie evidence of liability, is settled by the liquidators; calls are made by them, debts paid, the assets (if there be a surplus) distributed amongst the members according to their rights and interests in the company (e), and the rights of contributories adjusted (f). Arrangements sanctioned by extraordinary resolution bind the company, and (if acceded to by three-fourths in number and value) the creditors also, subject to a right of appeal to the Court by any contributory or creditor. On application by a liquidator or contributory, the Court may determine any question or exercise any power competent to it under a winding up by the Court (g). Liquidators, with the sanction of an extraordinary resolution, may compromise questions with creditors, contributories, or debtors of the company (h). Notwithstanding the existence of a voluntary winding up, a creditor, but not a shareholder, may have the company wound up by the Court, if the Court thinks that his rights will be prejudiced by a voluntary winding up (i).'

tarily (a). The effect of such a winding up is similar to that of an order for winding up by the Court, but the Court cannot do everything it could do under a compulsory winding up (b).'

	414-419. Bill of Lading.

404. Object of Maritime Contracts.—In those contracts and arrangements which relate to the maritime branch of the carrying trade, the object is not only to provide for the safe carriage of merchandise, but also to preserve to the merchant the full power of disposal in sale or mortgage during the transit; to provide for the necessities and accidents which may fall out during the voyage, or at its termination; and to indemnify the merchant or the shipowner for any loss which may arise from the perils of the sea or enemy. The subject may therefore be considered in relation to the contract of carriage or affreightment; to the partial loss during the voyage by jettison or salvage; to the contracts with the carpenters, seamen, and others, for the repairs and management of the ship; and to the indemnity by insurance of total or partial loss during the voyage. The contract of affreightment will be here explained; the other subjects hereafter.

'Maritime Law.—In all Admiralty causes, which are causes having reference to shipping, or to contracts or dealings connected with shipping, such as the Courts of Admiralty in Scotland (a) and England had jurisdiction to entertain, the law is the same in Scotland and England (b).'

(a) See Ersk. i. 3. 33.

(b) 1 Bell's Com. 546 sqq. (550, M'L.'s ed.). M'Knight v. Currie, 1896; A. C. 97. See also Brodie's Suppl. to Stair, p. 547 sq.; ch. ii. (Of Shipping) passim. Smith's Merc. Law, Introd. Blairmore Co. v. Macredie, 1897; 25 R. 893.

405. Definition and Constitution of Affreightment.—Affreightment is a contract of hiring or location, by which an entire ship, or part of it, is let on hire for the carriage of goods or of persons (a), or for some other lawful use to which it may be applied. It is a consensual contract, which requires writing only so far as a stamp is imposed (b), and of course is not confined to any particular form of words. Either a regular charter-party is made out; or an engagement less formal, by letter, or by heads of agreement signed by the parties, is sufficient; and often affreightment, especially when not of the whole ship, is left to depend on the bill of lading alone. The affreightment may be of the whole ship, either on time or for the voyage; or of a part, either by the owners of the ship, or by sub-affreightment (c) from one by whom the whole ship is freighted from the owners. 'It is a question of intention to be determined by construing the charter-party as a whole, whether in the phraseology of the English law there is a "demise" or "bailment" of the ship, i.e. whether the owner has parted with the possession and control of the ship and placed her entirely in the disposal of the charterer, the master and seamen being his servants; or he has merely contracted to carry by his ship and mariners the charterer's goods, or those of persons dealing with him as sub-freighters (d). In the former case the charterer assumes to third parties, whether or not aware of the charter-party (e), all the liabilities of an owner (f). In the latter case, while the charterer may be entitled to employ the ship as a general ship for his own profit, and the master, in signing bills of lading, does so as the charterer's agent and not the owner's, the owner remains in the legal possession of the ship, and thus, on the one hand, may exercise a lien for freight, even though he has no direct action against the shippers of goods dealing with the charterer (g), and, on the other hand, may incur liability for repairs and supplies (h), or for the negligence of the master and crew both to passengers and shippers of goods and to strangers injured by collision (i).'

(a) The hire of a whole ship or passage in a ship, for the conveyance of a family or company of persons or an individual, is regulated by the same principles with freight for carriage of goods. But it has been thought expedient to put this contract under special regulations, for greater safety and accommodation. The statutes on this subject, including the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104, § 291 sqq.), and amending Acts, have been repealed, and the present special rules as to passenger and emigrant ships are in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (57 and 58 Vict. c. 60, § 267-368). 406. Charter-Party.—A charter-party is the written instrument in which the contract of affreightment is formally expressed; specifying the ship in whole or in part; the term during which the ship is let, by time or voyage; the hire or freight; the time of loading and unloading; and the charge to be allowed for detention or demurrage. 'Charter-parties are generally on printed forms, blanks being filled up with particulars as to the voyage contemplated. The written words indicate the main purpose of the voyage, and in construction it is legitimate to limit and control the words used in print by the written words selected by the parties themselves (a). This instrument requires a stamp (b).

(a) Robertson v. French, 4 East, 135; 7 R. R. 535. Glynn v. Margetson, 1893; A. C. 350.

(b) 55 Geo. III. c. 78, Sched. part 1. The stamp is 6d., which may be denoted by an adhesive stamp, to be cancelled by the person last executing the instrument; or in the case of charter-parties executed abroad, adhibited and cancelled by any party thereto within ten days after it is received in the United Kingdom, and before it is executed by any one in the United Kingdom. Afterstamping by impressed stamp is competent only within a month after the first execution of the deed. See 54 and 55 Vict. c. 39, § 49-51 and Sched.; the Belfort, L. R. 9 P. D. 215.

407. The charter-party is executed by the owners or their accredited agent (sometimes also by the master) if hired at the owner's residence; abroad by the master alone, or by an agent duly authorised (a). It identifies the ship by its name (b), the name of the master, the burden or tonnage register measurement, and the place where the ship is at the time (c). But the tonnage stated in description is not conclusive between the parties as to the ship's capacity for carriage (d); and if it is intended to confine the engagement on either side to a certain tonnage, it must be specified distinctly, and the owners will be bound to that extent (e).

(a) As to charter-parties by agents, see above, § 224A. MacLachlan on Shipping, 355-360.

(b) As to national character, see Lothian v. Henderson, 1803; 4 Pat. 484; 3 B. & P. 499; 7 R. R. 829. A specification in the charter-party of the ship's class (at Lloyd's or otherwise) is only a warranty that she possesses such class at the time of executing the agreement. Hurst v. Osborne, 18 C. B. 144; 25 L. J. C. P. 209. Routh v. Macmillan, 33 L. J. Ex. 38; 2 H. & C. 750. French v. Newgass, 3 C. P. D. 163; 47 L. J. C. P. 361. A sailing vessel with an auxiliary screw is not properly described as a steamship. Fraser v. Telegr. Constr. Co., L. R. 7 Q. B. 566; 41 L. J. Q. B. 249.

408. (1.) Obligations of the Owners and Master.—The obligations under this contract, whether fully expressed or implied in the general agreement, are, that the ship shall 'at the beginning of the voyage (a)' be seaworthy, stout, staunch, and strong for the voyage, and furnished with all tackle and apparel necessary for it; and with a fit and proper master and crew (b).

'The warranty of seaworthiness is implied whether the contract be by charter-party or by bill of lading (c); and although the ship-owner does not hold himself out as a common carrier (d). It imports fitness for the particular kind of cargo to be carried (e); and it is violated, though the ship itself be sound and seaworthy, if unseaworthiness be caused by the manner of stowage (f). But failure to make use of a part of equipment with which the ship is furnished is negligence of the master or crew, and not unseaworthiness (g). Ignorance of defect in the ship is no defence; nor the most exact survey before setting out (h). In warranting the captain's fitness, his knowledge of the particular ports or perils specified is included (i).

Pilotage.—The obligation to employ a pilot rests in Scotland on the principles of mercantile law, 'and was' not regulated by the English Pilotage Acts (k), 'the master being bound in dangerous localities to have recourse to the best assistance that can be had in the circumstances (l). Whether the owners shall be liable for the unskilfulness of the pilot employed, is a question not decided; but at least to another ship suffering by faulty collision, it is 'at common law' no answer for the owner to say his ship was under a pilot's care (m).

The ship must have the proper clearances and papers for her protection, according to the law and custom of the country to and from which she sails (n).

Convoy.—She must sail with convoy, if stipulated or required at the time; and this may either be made an express warranty in the charter-party or bill of lading, or advertisement of the ship (o); or it may be left on the implied undertaking during war, and under the operation of those regulations which in most countries form a part of their war policy (p). The convoy must be that regularly appointed for the place of destination; it must be joined at the rendezvous ordered for vessels for that destination; its protection must be continued during the voyage, unless prevented by storm or inevitable accident; and the ship must obtain, as the legitimate proof of the convoy's protection, sailing instructions (q).

Beginning of Voyage.—The ship must, at the commencing port, be ready for the cargo at the day appointed; a failure in which may either discharge the contract or entitle to damages, 'i.e. according as it is a condition precedent, or a collateral agreement or warranty. Whether a covenant in a charter-party as to time or place is of the one character or the other, is a question of intention, to be determined by the language used by the parties (r). When time is specified in a charter-party, and the parties so contract with regard to it, that it is of the essence of the contract, it is held to be a condition precedent, and any failure justifies rescission (s). In all cases, where there is no express mention of time, the law implies that there shall be no unreasonable delay in commencing the voyage. Such implied agreement, however, is not a condition precedent, but a warranty involving damages; and it justifies repudiation of the charter-party only when its purposes are entirely frustrated by the delay (t). The ship must sail at the day appointed, wind and weather serving; but the master must on no account sail in tempestuous weather (u).

Voyage—Deviation.—The voyage must be performed according to the rules of good seamanship; and this comprehends a careful avoidance of all deviation from the correct voyage, unless compelled by storm, or enemies, or pirates, or the want of water, 'or justified by settled usage (v), or by the duty of saving life (w), or by the contract (x)'; such deviation lasting no longer than the necessity (y).

Care of Goods and Delivery.—Due preparation must be made, and care taken of the goods in loading and unloading (z). The goods must be safely delivered (aa) 'at the port of discharge agreed upon, which the master is bound to use all reasonable means to reach, even by lightening the ship at the entrance of the port, if that can be done without risk or substantial inconvenience, and if the consignee be ready to take partial delivery (bb).'

409. (2.) Obligations of the Freighter.—

He must furnish a cargo, which implies that it is lawful; and he will be liable in damages if, by lading prohibited or uncustomed goods, the ship shall be detained or forfeited (a). If the ship be freighted rateably, the cargo must be full; not according to the tonnage in the description, but according to the fair capacity of the ship (b); and if the freight be in a slump sum, the cargo must be such as at least to cover or secure the freight. The freighter must send the cargo ready for embarkation within a reasonable time, if the day be not specially appointed; or on the day fixed by the charter-party; otherwise the master may either hold the agreement as abandoned, and sail on another voyage, or wait and claim damages for detention (c). The freighter must pay a sum or freight for the whole ship, or rateably, according to the ton, etc.; or a sum for the voyage, or time; or rateably per day, week, month, etc., of the ship's employment (d). And he must avoid undue delay in taking delivery (e).

410. A receipt for the goods fixes them on the shipowners and master (a). But a bill of lading (b) is taken from the shipmaster, 'or other person authorised by the owner to grant it (c),' in most cases; even where, by hiring on time, the affreighter takes the ship entirely into his own management. 'When the master signs the bill of lading as agent for the freighter and not for the shipowner, the latter has no direct action against the shippers for the freight (d).' It is useful not only to fix the condition of the goods, for which the shipmaster and owners are to be responsible, but to entitle the person who shall hold it to demand delivery of the goods (e). It must be given to the shipper or holder of the receipt, in exchange for a previous receipt if granted (f).

411. Affreightment by General Ship.—The master of a general ship, advertised for the voyage as ready to receive goods, is a common carrier.

412. (1.) The advertisement is regarded as an offer to receive and carry the goods. It is completed into a special agreement, by fixing the goods with the master under that advertisement; and it so becomes binding on the owners (a). But it is not yet settled whether the special terms of that advertisement are to be taken as a warranty, especially if not repeated in the bill of lading; as when a ship is advertised to sail with convoy (b). The description of the voyage, however, as stated in the advertisement, is held by merchants as a special engagement (c). The advertisement entitles a merchant to bring his goods to the ship, and to insist on them being taken on board, unless the ship has already been filled up, or has been actually engaged (d).

413. (2.) Receipt.—To close the contract, there is sometimes an intermediate receipt (a), sometimes only a bill of lading (b). The receipt is used to fix the goods with the master and owners, and is a mere acknowledgment given by the mate, or the person in command of the ship at the time when the goods are put on board. It charges the master and owners with the goods mentioned in it, and binds the contract within the limits of the advertisement (c). It is generally held sufficient under the implied conditions of the contract, in coasting vessels and smacks, or steamboats. In more distant voyages, or for the regulation of the delivery of the goods, a bill of lading is taken from the master, and the receipt delivered up (d). If the master should sign a bill of lading for delivery to another than the holder of the receipt, or the person pointed out by him, he would make himself liable to both parties; the receipt preserving to the shipper his full right to stop in transitu, or transfer the goods, as he may think proper (e).

Ex. 211. Arrospe v. Barr, 1881; 8 R. 602 ("conditions as per charter-party"—"clean" bill of lading). Although brokers may be entrusted with the function of arranging the terms of the contract of carriage to be inserted in the bill of lading, the master is still bound to state matters of fact correctly, such as the fact and date of shipment of cargo, and liable to his owners for negligence or falsehood. *Stumore, Weston, & Co. v. 414. Bill of Lading.—This instrument has two objects,—to fix the condition of the goods as received on board, and to give a title to some one to demand delivery. It therefore contains a written acknowledgment of the goods received on board, with an obligation to deliver them,—"the act of God (a), the king's enemies (b), fire, and all other dangers and accidents of the seas, etc., of whatever nature and kind soever, excepted" (c). This instrument requires a stamp, whether the goods are to be exported or carried coastwise (d). 'As between charterer and ship-owner, a bill of lading is in general a mere receipt; but it is the contract on which (the goods being received, § 418 (d)) the indorsee must rely as between himself and the ship-owner (e). Being the contract, it may not be qualified by parole evidence (f). A reference in the usual terms to the charter-party in the bill of lading incorporates so much of the charter-party only as relates to payment of freight and other conditions to be performed on delivery of the cargo, but does not give the holders constructive notice of its other contents (g).'

415. The description of the goods in the bill of lading deserves particular care, as the master makes himself and his owners liable for them in the condition mentioned (a). The goods, if in sound condition, are in the bill stated to be "received in good order," and the obligation is to deliver them in the like good condition (b). But if, as frequently happens, the quality or even the quantity is unknown to the master, he usually and properly adds, "quality or quantity unknown," and then is responsible only for the external and apparent quality (c).

416. The risks to which the owners under their obligation to deliver are liable, exclude, by the express exceptions of the bill of lading, all perils of the sea and enemy, and inevitable accidents; and even for those risks to which, by the policy of the law, they are liable, their responsibility has been greatly limited by statute (a). 'As a shipowner is bound to carry with reasonable care, this exception does not save him if the loss by perils of the sea, etc., is caused by previous default on his part (b).'

"Perils of the sea" are not to be construed differently in a bill of lading or charter-party and in a policy of insurance; but in the latter, which is a contract of indemnity, the effect of negligence is different (see below, § 472 (1)). Wilson, Sons, & Co., cit. Hamilton, Fraser, & Co. v. Pandorf & Co., 12 App. Ca. 518.

417. Bills of lading are, by the law and usage of merchants, negotiable instruments, passing to 'onerous bonâ fide (a)' indorsees and other holders untrammelled by any latent claim or exception; and in order to facilitate the use of them as negotiable instruments, they are made out in sets (commonly of three): one for transmission by post; one to go with the cargo; one for the shipper: And all of them contain a clause, as in foreign bills of exchange, that, one being performed, the rest shall be void (b). 'The indorsation and delivery of the bill of lading by custom of merchants passes the property of the goods which it represents (c); but it did not pass the contract with the carrier so as to enable the transferee to sue on it or be sued for freight or demurrage (d). Now, however, by statute it transfers to the consignee named in it, and to the indorsees to whom the property of the goods passes,—not being mere pledgees who have not taken possession or dealt with the goods (e),—all rights of action and all liabilities in respect of the goods, just as if the contract in the bill of lading had been made with them; but without prejudice to any right of stoppage in transitu (§ 1307), or to any right to claim freight against the original shipper, or to any liability of the consignee or indorsee as such, or by his receipt of the goods (f).

'Assignees of bills of lading may become liable for the freight of goods by receiving them in such circumstances as imply a contract to pay freight (g); or for demurrage by receiving goods under a bill of lading making them deliverable on paying demurrage, and clearly imposing the liability, the receipt and other circumstances being in such cases evidence of a contract to pay (h).'

418. In bills of lading, the obligation to deliver the goods is either general, to the bearer, or in blank; or, filled up to a particular person, as consignee, or to his order, or to his assigns; or, to the consignor and his assigns (a). The consignee named in the bill of lading, or the indorsee (b) of an assignable bill of lading, or the holder of one blank indorsed, is entitled to demand the goods from the master on payment of freight, 'or from one to whom they have been wrongfully delivered, or one who has wrongfully parted with them (c).

'A bill of lading is a living instrument, and may be transferred—even after the goods are landed at a London sufferance wharf, and before a wharfinger's or warehouseman's certificate has been given, the master's engagement not being completely fulfilled; or after an actual, but wrongful, delivery of the goods, to the effect of vesting the indorsee with the right to sue the ship for damages (d).

'A bill of lading in the hands of a consignee or indorsee for valuable consideration is by statute conclusive evidence of shipment of goods against the master or other person signing it, although the goods may not have been shipped, unless the holder when he received the bill had actual notice that they were not on board. The master or person signing may, however, exonerate himself by showing that he was not to blame, and that the mistake arose wholly from the fraud of the shipper or holder, or one under whom the holder claims (e). So it is not conclusive against the shipowner not signing it, for the master is not his agent to sign for goods which he never received. Neither at common law nor under the statute are shipowners liable for non-delivery of goods mentioned in bills of lading but not actually shipped (f). The onus of disproving the bill of lading lies, of course, on the ship (g); and mere general evidence that all the goods put on board were delivered does not discharge this burden (h).

'The shipowner or master, so long as he has no notice or knowledge of any dealing with the other parts of the bill of lading, is excused if he deliver to the person appearing to be the assign of the part first presented to him (i). But in a question of ownership between competing holders of two parts of the bill of lading, the property passes to him who first gets possession of any one of the parts as indorsee (k). A purchaser is not justified in refusing to accept and pay, under a contract for payment on presentation of bill of lading, on the ground that only one of the set is tendered, and the others are not accounted for (l).'

418A. 'A bill of lading is generally made in favour of some person "or his assigns" (a). In general, delivery of goods by a seller to a carrier or shipmaster for conveyance to the buyer passes not only the risk (supra, § 87, 88, 117 (c)), but the property, the shipmaster being the buyer's agent to receive them (b). But (1) when a bill of lading is taken from the master, the delivery of the goods to him is not necessarily delivery to the buyer, but to the master as agent or bailee for the consignee indicated by the bill of lading (c). (2) Prima facie, delivery on board under a bill of lading to the consignor himself, "his order or assigns," shows his intention to retain the property (or jus disponendi) until it is passed by indorsation and delivery of the bill of lading (d). (3) It may, however, be shown by evidence that in taking the bill in his own name the consignor was acting on behalf of the buyer, and did not intend to retain the control over the goods (e). (4) Even when the delivery is on board the purchaser's own ship, the consignor may, by the terms of the bill of lading, retain control over the goods and prevent the property from passing (f). (5) When a bill of exchange for the price of the goods is sent to the buyer for acceptance, along with a bill of lading to the consignor indorsed by him, the buyer is bound to accept the bill of exchange; and if he refuse to do so, he acquires no right to the bill of lading or the goods (g). In all these cases the real question is on whose behalf the master has possession, and of this the terms of the bill of lading are important, but not always conclusive, evidence.

'The transfer of a bill of lading by indorsation and delivery, differing formerly from transfers of documents of title to goods on land in which notice to the custodian and his assent were required (§ 1305, infra), itself passes the property (h).'

(a) Without these words it rather seems that a bill of lading is not negotiable. See Henderson v. Comptoir d'Escompte, L. R. 5 P. C. 253; 42 L. J. P. C. 60. 1 Smith's L. C. 460. M'Laren's Bell's Com. i. 220.

Goods shipped without an order may, even after the signing of the bill of lading, be countermanded by the shipper; but not if shipped on order, and a bill granted (d) 'with the intention that it shall operate as immediate payment (e).'

420. Payment of Freight.—Freight is the hire due for the carriage of goods, and is either a gross sum for the voyage; or a rateable payment per ton of the ship's burden, or according to the size, weight, etc., of the goods transported (a); or by time, at so much per month (b), etc. It includes "primage" or "hat money," a small payment for the master's care (c); and "petty average," for towing, beaconage, etc. Sometimes a sum is agreed to be paid 'in advance, or' "on lading the goods"; but that, strictly speaking, is not freight, nor redemandable on the voyage not being completed (d).

(a) Prima facie, the weight or measurement at the port of delivery is the criterion of freight to be paid; but this rule is varied by proof that such weight or measurement is fallacious by reason of the thing carried altering in bulk or weight during the voyage, or by special agreement. *Gibson v. In England it is settled by the cases cited above that any prepayment in the nature of freight stipulated in the charter-party, being paid for lading the goods on board, is not recoverable on the failure of the voyage, unless the parties have clearly contracted that it shall be treated as a loan independent of freight. By the law of Scotland and the general maritime law, however, an advance against freight or on account of freight may, if there be nothing in the contract to infer a different intention, be recovered on the loss of the ship and cargo, the consideration on which it was advanced having thus failed. Watson & Co. v. Shankland, 1871; 10 Macph. 142; aff. 1873, 11 Macph. H. L. 51; L. R. 2 H. L. 304. The H. of L. affirmed the judgment on a special ground not involving assent to the law on which the C. of S. proceeded. The controversy arises from an artificial construction of the contracts in the earlier English cases.

421. Payment of freight is stipulated in the charter-party, and always made a condition of delivery of the goods in the bill of lading, "he or they paying freight" (a). Both on the principles of the contract of carriage, and on this condition, the master has a lien for the freight (b); but it has been questioned whether the master, if he give up the goods without insisting on payment of the freight does not waive the shipper's obligation for freight, and limit his demand to the person receiving the goods. In several cases, English and Scottish, it has been held that the condition 'in the bill of lading' is not for the shipper's security, and so the personal obligation of the shipper is not discharged, but remains entire under the charter-party (c), 'in addition to the liability for freight of the consignee or indorsee receiving the goods as owner, or in such circumstances as to imply an undertaking to pay freight (d)'; that 'even' when there is no charter-party, but a bill of lading only, the shipper is 'not' discharged (e); but, in an American case, the equitable distinction was taken, that where the consignor has the real interest in the goods, the same rule holds whether the goods are sent under a charter-party or under a bill of lading (f).

'It has become usual for charterers (especially when they make the charter-party as agents) to stipulate that their liability for freight and other prestations under the contract shall cease when the cargo is loaded, the shipowner then relying on his lien over the cargo. This cesser clause is sometimes made still wider, conferring a lien for demurrage and dead freight, and exempting the charterer from liability for all claims of every description (g). There has been difficulty in some cases in determining how far the exemption extends; e.g. whether to demurrage incurred before the completed loading, or to unliquidated damages for detention in the nature of demurrage. The words may be extensive enough to free the charterer from all liability under the charter-party, they may free him absolutely from liabilities accruing both before and after loading. If, however, they are open to construction, not only may the construction be aided by reference to the extent of the equivalent lien given, but as cesser clauses are generally connected with the creation of a corresponding lien, it is a rule of construction, when clauses are so linked or coupled, that the shipowner is not understood to give up rights stipulated for in another part of the charter without compensation. Unless the cesser clause is so expressed as to exclude such a meaning, it will relieve the charterers from so much only of their liability as is commensurate with the lien given to the ship (h). Demurrage will be construed in the popular sense, if the word appears to have been so used (i), but in a combined lien and cesser clause it does not cover damages for undue detention at the port of loading (k). When the cesser of liability exists, it applies, even when the charterer is also consignee, to exclude action upon the charter-party, and restrict the shipowner to the exercise of his lien, or to the contract arising from the receipt of the goods under the bill of lading (l).'

(a) As to clauses importing the conditions of the charter-party into the bill of lading, see Gray v. Carr, infra (g). Porteous v. Watney, 3 Q. B. D. 534; 47 L. J. Q. 422. The general rule is, that freight is due only for a voyage completed by delivery of the goods at their destined port; for such, by their contract, is the engagement of the shipowners, and such the counter-engagement of the merchant. But this rule admits of certain distinctions and exceptions; a part of the freight being demandable in certain cases, though the whole of what has been undertaken has not been done (a).

423. Where the ship is lost or disabled, but the goods are saved, the master may tranship the goods in order to convey them to their destination, and so earn his full freight; and he may keep the goods a reasonable time for the purpose of completing the voyage (a). 'If he abandons the voyage without the charterer's consent, unless the effect of the excepted perils makes it physically impossible to complete the voyage, or impossible except by such expenditure on the ship as no prudent owner would incur, the shipowners are liable in damages (b).'

424. If the goods have arrived at their destined port damaged, the rules are, that where the merchant takes the goods, freight is due, without abatement for damage or expense, unless occasioned by fault or insufficiency of the ship (a); 'that, unless the shipper be barred by taking delivery without objection, his illiquid claim for such damages may, contrary to the rule which till lately obtained in England (b), be pleaded by way of exception in answer to an action for the freight (c)'; that the merchant will not be allowed to pick and choose, but must take or leave the whole goods (d). But where the damage arises from mere accident or irresistible force, it has been doubted whether the merchant may abandon the goods for the freight (e). In Scotland, as the master is liable only for fault or breach of warranty (f), it would seem that there is no legal ground for throwing the risk on the owners, and allowing the merchant to abandon the goods for the freight; the owners having fulfilled their contract by carrying the goods to their port.

425. If by peril of the sea or hostile power the ship have stopped short in her voyage and cannot proceed, or the goods be carried away, freight pro rata itineris is due where the goods are taken by the merchant. This proceeds on an implied new contract, the original contract being left unfulfilled (a), 'founded on the voluntary acceptance of the goods by the freighter at the intermediate port, not alone, but if attended with such circumstances as to show that the further carriage was intentionally dispensed with (b).'

When the undertaking is to carry goods to a certain port, the duration of the voyage, 'and the accidents of the sea or river at that port (a), are' at the risk of the owners; where it is a contract on time, the duration is at the risk of the merchant. Detention during necessary repairs in course of voyage is regulated by this distinction (b). 'A ship bound to carry to a port or dock, "or as near thereto as she can safely get," is entitled to discharge under the second alternative, when the impediment to her entering the port or dock (e.g. overcrowding), though not permanent, will cause unreasonable delay and detention, i.e. such as the parties could not have contemplated when making the contract (c).'

430. Dead Freight is the consideration which, as damages, one who engages to furnish a full lading, and fails to fill up the ship, must pay for the loss which the owners would otherwise suffer by part of the space being left unoccupied. It is not properly freight, but indemnity, 'or rather damages,' grounded on the covenant to fill up the ship (a). Where the freight is rateable on a uniform cargo, there is no difficulty in ascertaining the amount; but where there are different articles to be paid for at different rates, it becomes necessary to take the average on the voyage (b). There is no lien for dead freight without a special bargain (c).

431. Lay Days and Demurrage.—Lay days are the days stipulated for loading and unloading; and demurrage is the time during which the freighter may detain the ship still longer on certain terms (a). These are regulated by the special agreement, in which the expression "working days" excludes Sundays and holidays at the Custom-house; "running days" includes every day, 'and means calendar days and not periods of twenty-four hours (b)'; and the general expression "days" is held to mean running days, unless usage has otherwise settled (c). 'A fraction of a day is reckoned as a whole day (d); and demurrage or despatch money estimated by hours runs continuously day and night (e).' The lay days for 'loading or' unloading commence on the ship's arrival at the usual 'or stipulated' (f) place of 'loading or' discharge. In some places the port extends far beyond the place of unloading; and it is not on reaching the port in such cases that the lay days begin, 'nor, on the other hand, at the actual discharging berth,' but on arriving at the 'dock or' place of discharge (g).

Where the usual time is to be allowed for unloading, or where there is no stipulation on that point, the lay and demurrage days are regulated by the custom of the port and the principles of common law relative to demurrage; and a delay occasioned by the state of the port will not fall on the merchant (h).

'A vessel having a "floating clause" in her charter-party, or whose draught prevents her from reaching the usual place of discharge, is bound to lighten, where such is the custom, to enable her to reach the port of discharge (i); and the time spent in lightening is reckoned in her lay days (k). In charter-parties, as in other contracts which are silent as to the time of performance, the obligation is to load or discharge within a reasonable time, i.e. a reasonable time under the existing circumstances (l).

'The shipowner and merchant are bound to use reasonable diligence in loading or discharging (m); and if delay or unreadiness occurs without fault on either side, and from a cause over which neither party has any control, such as a strike of labourers, or the crowded state of the port, ice, etc., the loss remains where it falls (n). Under a general stipulation for despatch in loading and discharging, it has been held that delay at the port of loading cannot be made up by extra despatch in discharging (o).'

432. When lay days and demurrage 'days' are stipulated, the shipper's obligation is absolute not to detain the ship beyond the days; and he will be liable for the demurrage, or for the loss arising from further detention, although occasioned by circumstances over which he has no control (a); 'as, e.g., the crowded state of the docks (b); the state of the weather (c); a strike (d); or, in short, any ordinary vicissitudes or causes of detention which are not attributable to the shipowner or his agents or servants (e). But it is a good defence to an action for demurrage that the detention was due to the fault or negligence of the shipowner or his master (f); or to an impediment expressly excepted by the shipowner in the charter-party (g). In a general ship a consignee liable for demurrage is not excused because the delay was caused by consignees of other parts of the cargo (h).'

tion in which they were delivered, barring the perils of the sea, hostile force, and inevitable accident. Under these exceptions are included such dangers and accidents of the sea, rivers, and navigation as are unavoidable; as of rocks, sandbanks, collision (b); capture by the enemy or by pirates (c); loss by irresistible force of man; (d) actual detention by kings, princes, and rulers (e). But where the loss, directly or indirectly, arises from want of skill or faulty navigation (as deviation from the right course), the owners will be liable (f). 'Even clauses in charter-parties or bills of lading expressly freeing the shipowners from liability for breakage, leakage, collision, and such like, do not exempt them from liability for the negligence of themselves or the crew; they only shift the onus probandi (g). But more extensive clauses of exemption are now common, and are valid, e.g. exempting from all fault of the master or mariners (h); or from liability for any damage that can be covered by insurance (i). The master is bound, wherever he is not saved by express exemption, to take all reasonable care of the cargo, and when it is damaged by a cause for which he is not responsible, he ought still at the shipper's expense to use all reasonable means to save it from deterioration or destruction by the consequences of the accident, as by unshipping and drying it, when that is a reasonable and ordinary course, and is not attended with delay of the voyage (k). As the Carriers Act does not apply to carriers by water, limitation of liability by notice is still open to ship-owners (l).' The owners are also liable according to the rules of public policy, grounded on the Edict Nautæ Caupones, etc. (m).

436. The responsibility of shipowners is limited by the Legislature in certain cases 'where loss or damage happens without their actual fault or privity' (a). Thus, the owners of ships occupied in sea voyages are not liable for loss by fire (b). But this exemption has been held not to apply to small craft, lighters, and boats concerned in inland navigation (c). 'By 57 and 58 Vict. c. 60, § 502, owners of seagoing ships are not liable for loss or damage—1st, to any goods or merchandise by fire on board ship (see above, § 239); or, 2nd, to any gold, silver, diamonds, watches, jewels, or precious stones, by robbery, embezzlement, making away with or secreting them, unless the true nature or value has been declared in writing on the bill of lading or otherwise at the time of shipping.' Owners are not liable for loss by the fault of the pilot 'when the employment of such pilot is compulsory by statute (d); but they are responsible for a pilot who is appointed by them, when they are not required by law to do so (e).' Those exemptions do not extend to masters. Owners 'were by earlier statutes' liable only to the amount of the value of the ship and freight (f), which 'was' to be calculated at the time of the loss or damage; and the value as to freight 'was' to be only the amount that the ship would have earned had she completed her voyage (g).

'The last of these statutes was repealed, and a somewhat different rule enacted by the Merchant Shipping Act, 17 and 18 Vict.

c. 104, § 504. But this also has been repealed; and by 25 and 26 Vict. c. 63, § 54, now included in 57 and 58 Vict. c. 60, § 503, it is enacted that the owners of any ship, British or foreign, shall not—where without their actual fault or privity (h) (1) loss of life or personal injury is caused to persons carried in their ships; or (2) damage or loss is caused to goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board their ships; or (3) loss of life or personal injury is, by improper navigation (i) of their ship, caused to persons in another ship or boat; or (4) loss or damage is so caused to any other ship, or boat, or goods, merchandise, or things on board any other ship or boat—be answerable in damages in respect of loss of life or personal injury, either alone or together with loss or damage to ships, boats, goods, merchandise, or other things, to an aggregate amount exceeding £15 for each ton of the ship's tonnage; nor in respect of loss or damage to ships, goods, merchandise, or other things, whether there be in addition loss of life or personal injury, or not, to an aggregate amount exceeding £8 for each ton of the ship's tonnage; i.e. in case of sailing ships, the registered, and in case of steamers, the gross tonnage, without deduction on account of engine room, but excluding the certified berthage of the crew (k). A shipowner, whether admitting or not his liability for loss or damage, may apply to the Court of Chancery or the Court of Session for the purpose of determining the amount of such liability, and distributing it among the claimants, and of staying other proceedings (l). The limitation does not save the shipowner from interest from the date of collision, or from costs (m); and applies only to injury done to or on board ship, not to a pier, or wharf, or anything ashore (n).'

I. GENERAL AVERAGE.

437. Nature of it.—The losses which are suffered at sea, when not total, are commonly called average losses; distinguished by the terms “particular average” and “general or gross average.” Particular average is the partial loss or damage, directly occasioned by shipwreck, or other accidental misfortune to the ship, in its hull, rigging, anchors, etc., or to the cargo, or any part of it. General average is a loss accomplished by the hand of man, in the voluntary throwing over of something for the common benefit of all concerned in the voyage. The former misfortune falls where it lights; the latter is a sacrifice, for indemnification of which all are bound to contribute. The principles according to which the contribution in general average is to be settled, are those of a partnership by necessity; as explained in the “Lex Rhodia de Jactu,” adopted under certain modifications in the several commercial countries of Europe, “Si levandæ navis gratia jactus mercium factus est, omnium contributione sarciatur, quod pro omnibus datum est”’ (a).

438. The Requisites to Contribution are: That a sacrifice shall have been purposely and advisedly made, by the hand of man, of part of the cargo, or of ship, rigging, etc., for the common safety (a); and that the property of those concerned shall be preserved, or still remain to them. In some of the maritime codes, it is required that there shall be a consultation of those concerned on board; but it is sufficient to raise the right to contribution, if, with such deliberate purpose as time and circumstances permit, the sacrifice shall have been resolved upon as necessary to the common safety, in a case of real danger (b). It is not indispensable that the thing shall have been actually thrown overboard or destroyed; but sufficient if it have been exposed to loss for the common benefit, and have suffered from such exposure (c). Nor is it necessary that the property shall have been saved by means of the sacrifice, provided it be saved. Although the sacrifice, by all deemed necessary, or such as all, if present, would have consented to at the time, may have proved needless in the event, yet those whose goods remain to them must contribute on the principles of partnership by necessity. This, however, is contrary to the rules of some maritime codes (d).

(a) Hence, if a ship be accidentally stranded, the expenses incurred in discharging the cargo, but not afterwards, as for discharging ship’s stores, or of getting the ship afloat, are general average. Job v. Langton, 6 E. & B. 779; 26 L. J. Q. B. 97. If a ship be intentionally run on shore to avoid foundering or striking on dangerous rocks, it is held by Prof. Bell, and has been decided in America and Scotland, that the shipowners are entitled to contribution for loss or damage of the ship from the cargo saved. 1 Bell’s Com. 589 (635, M’L’s ed.). *Colombian Insur. 439. The goods sacrificed, or thrown overboard, must have been regularly on board as part of the cargo. So there is no contribution for the loss of goods stowed on deck, 'unless such mode of carriage is justified by the usage of trade'; for they are held an encumbrance (a), and the sole remedy to the owner is against the master. 'Even if the goods be carried on deck under an agreement to that effect with the owner of them, there is no right to contribution in a question with the other shippers of cargo (b). One who has by his fault occasioned the peril which gives rise to the claim, cannot claim indemnity or contribution on account of his jettisoned goods or of his ship (c). Goods on board without a bill of lading are presumed supernumerary, and are not to be indemnified by average unless proved to be regularly on board (d); but if saved, they must contribute.

If goods be thrown over merely to lighten the ship for the convenience of getting into port, there is no contribution (e); but if thrown over to enable the ship to get over a bar as a refuge from the enemy, or for repair necessary to the safety of all concerned, or to be floated from a bank on which she has struck, or to escape from an enemy, contribution will be due (f). Where goods are sent on shore in lighters for debarkation, their loss is not average; but if placed in lighters to lighten the ship for the general safety, contribution will be due (g). Masts, etc., cut away and sacrificed for the ship's safety are average; but not when cut away on account of injury sustained by perils of the sea (h). The sacrifice or cutting up of sails, ropes, etc., for stopping a leak, is average (i). So is damage done in the course of making the sacrifice (k). 'Money paid for salvage services is general average loss (l); and damage done and expense incurred by an abnormal use of the ship's engines for the common safety in, e.g., a stranded ship (m). The expense of going into port for the general safety, and for unloading, loading, warehouse rent, 'seamen's wages,' etc., in order to repair 'general' average loss, 'with the expense of the repairs occasioned by the sacrifice, and generally extraordinary expenditure properly incurred for the general interest,' is 'general' average (n), 'but not as a general rule, expense incurred for the ship after the cargo is saved, and the community of interest between it and the ship is over (o). The result of many contending opinions, and various regulations on the question of going into port for repairing sea damage, not itself 'general' average loss, seems to be that the expense, 'beyond the charges of entering the port (as towage, dues, etc.), and of the unloading of the cargo, if necessary for the safety of both ship and cargo (p),' is not average.

'It was thought, and was formerly laid down in this section (q), that the cost of repairing the ship was general average,' in so far as necessary for safety in prosecuting the voyage, and of no further use to the ship; 'but that doctrine is erroneous, the true principle being that, if the damage was incurred by the mere violence of the wind and weather, without voluntary sacrifice on the part of the shipowner for the benefit of all concerned, it falls, with the expenses consequent upon it, within his contract to keep his ship tight, staunch, and strong, and fit for the service. But if for the safety of both ship and cargo transhipment or unloading is necessary, the expense of such unloading, but not that of reloading, is a general average loss. It seems that on principle (although there has been some variation in practice), nothing ought to be charged to general average which is not itself within the definition of a general average sacrifice, or is the direct result of one (r). So a loss, however extraordinary, that is caused in the mere fulfilment of the shipowner's contract, as in repelling a hostile attack (s), or purchasing coal to prosecute the voyage with an auxiliary screw when the vessel is disabled from carrying sail (t), is not a general average loss.'

440. The Subjects of Contribution are—the cargo, ship (a), and freight. The cargo includes the goods thrown overboard (b); those loaded on deck (c); luggage in chests and boxes (d). But persons or apparel are not liable to contribution (e). The ship contributes, deducting stores and provisions, wear and tear, and partial loss (f). 441. Valuation and Apportionment.—In valuing and apportioning the contribution, the guiding principle is, that the owner of the property sacrificed is to be placed in the same condition as if his property had been part of what is saved. The rules observed are these:—If the ship reaches her port without further damage, the property sacrificed is to be valued at the market price of the port of delivery, freight, duties, and charges deducted; and it must bear its share of the contribution (a). The goods which arrive in port undamaged are taken at their actual value in the port of discharge, deducting charges, etc. (b); if put back, they are taken at the invoice price (c); if stopped short of their destination, at their value where stopped. If the goods saved be damaged after the jettison, the deteriorated value must be taken. The owner of goods lost pays no contribution for them.

(a) Benecke, 286. The jettisoned goods are to be estimated at the value they would have had if they had arrived at the port of adjustment; and if they would have arrived in a damaged condition, allowance must be made. Fletcher v. Alexander, 37 L. J. C. P. 193; L. R. 3 C. P. 375.

(b) Marshall, 434, 502. Stevens, 51. See 2 Kent, Com. 242.

(c) Abbott, 529. Stevens, 52, 53.

442. Who liable.—The true owner of the goods saved is the person liable to contribution, 'and he becomes so liable only on the vessel's arrival' (a); and the claim 'upon the cargo' may be secured by lien. If average be made a condition in the bill of lading, a consignee taking the goods will be liable. But if there be no such condition, and the goods are given up to a consignee not the owner, without an express or implied contract by him to pay average, the claim lies only against the consignor (b). 'In the case of a general ship it is the duty of the shipowners or master to have the contribution settled and collect the amount; and with that view to require a bond from each owner on delivery of his goods for payment of his proportion of the loss; and for failure to do so they are liable to an action at the instance of an owner entitled to contribution (c). Each owner of jettisoned goods becomes a creditor of ship and cargo saved; and may recover contribution either by direct action or by enforcing through the shipmaster as his agent a lien on each parcel of goods saved (d).'

II. SALVAGE.

443. Nature of Salvage.—Salvage is a reward or recompense given to those by means of whose labour, intrepidity, or perseverance, a ship, or goods, 'or the lives of persons from a British ship or boat, or from a foreign ship or boat within British waters, or, when the Government of a foreign country has assented to such exercise of the jurisdiction of British Courts, from ships of that country even when beyond British jurisdiction (a),' have been saved from shipwreck, fire, or capture (b). 'Salvage for life is payable by the owners of the ship or cargo, and as regards the owners of the ship has priority to other salvage claims. Where the ship is lost, or its value is insufficient, the Board of Trade may award such sum as it deems fit out of the Mercantile Marine Fund (c).' It rests on plain principles of equity, and a right of lien; but the rate of salvage to be allowed, and the rules applied, are in all countries regulated by particular laws (d). 'It is due by those, whether owners of ship or cargo, who would have borne the loss had there been no rescue (e); and consequently salvage calculated upon the value of ship, freight, and cargo may be recovered from the shipowners without suing the owners of cargo, if the freight exceed the value of the cargo, so that the merchant has no benefit by the salvage (f), or if the peril have been caused by the fault of the ship, making the ship-owners liable to the owners of cargo (g).'

444. Persons entitled to Salvage.—One who is not otherwise in duty bound to interfere for the safety of the ship or cargo, is at common law entitled to recompense for his services in preserving the ship for the owners (a).

The master and crew 'of the ship for which salvage services are rendered' have no right to salvage; for they are bound to exert themselves to the utmost for the service and safety of the ship. There is an exception, however, to this rule, in the case of rescue after capture; for capture puts an end to the contract of the master and crew. The saving or rescue of the ship by the master or seamen, from mutiny, does not come under this exception; for their service is not thereby terminated (b).

Passengers, 'though bound to render all assistance in danger without title to salvage,' are entitled to salvage, if they continue with the ship after they might have left it, and exert themselves 'in an extraordinary manner' for its safety (c). A pilot 'or tug-boat master' is not in general entitled to salvage; but extraordinary exertions of skill, or courage, or intrepidity may raise his professional charge to salvage (d). 'Stipulations by seamen abandoning their rights to salvage are inoperative, except in the case of seamen serving in a ship which by the terms of agreement is to be employed on salvage service (e).'

A claim as joint salvor must 'when the object of the salvage is a derelict' be supported by evidence of the necessity for interference (f); 'and in other cases the salvors are in general subject to the control of the master or owners of the vessel in danger, and their aid may be refused by him (g).' No operation, previous to recapture, will entitle a ship which is not present to claim salvage; neither will a ship merely for being in sight at recapture, have any share, unless it 'were' a King's ship (h). 'But the Crown or the Board of Admiralty cannot now claim salvage as owners, and no claim for salvage services rendered by the commander or crew of any ship belonging to Her Majesty shall be made without consent of the Board of Admiralty being first obtained (i).' Co-operation will give a joint right; but if merely constructive, it will not (k).

'The owners of the salving vessel, in addition to expenses, when they have actually suffered loss or risk of their property, have a right to salvage (l); but not charterers, unless the vessel be demised to them, or they have a clause giving them the benefit of salvage (m).'

It has been doubted whether a convoy is entitled to salvage for recapture of one of the fleet (n).

445. When due.—The occasions on which salvage is due are—Shipwreck, Recapture, and Derelict.

(1.) Shipwreck.—When goods are saved from shipwreck, they may be retained for payment of the salvage (a). 'When the salvage occurs in the United Kingdom, they are to be delivered to and taken charge of by the Receiver appointed by the Board of Trade, who may detain them till satisfaction is made of the salvage, or security given for its payment (b).' The 'early' provisions 'of an Act of Queen Anne' for compelling persons in certain public situations on the shores of the island, and ships in the neighbourhood, to give aid, and regulating the mode in which their salvage is to be decided 'extended' to Scotland (c). But the 'later' Act for compelling other persons to give aid, and regulating their salvage, 'did' not extend to Scotland; this matter 'was' left to the common law (d), 'until the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854. Under that and the statute of 1894 Receivers of Wreck are appointed throughout the United Kingdom, to whom all wreck found must be brought under a severe penalty; and who are invested with power to search for wreck concealed, and to impress men for aiding vessels in distress (e).'

(2.) Recapture.—A material change has been made by statute on the former rule with regard to salvage of ships retaken from the enemy. Formerly, if a vessel had on capture been condemned as prize, or was carried by the enemy infra præsidia, the original owner was completely divested of his property, and the recaptor entitled to keep the subject retaken (f). But by statute the owner is entitled to restitution on payment of salvage, at whatever period the recapture may have taken place (g). To this, however, by the policy of the Prize Acts, there is an exception of ships taken by the enemy, and set forth as ships of war while in their hand; when retaken, they are deemed prize, not subject to restitution on salvage (h).

Co-operation in recapture will, as already said, give joint right; and so a privateer actually co-operating with a King's ship, if not officiously, will be held a joint salvor (i); and a King's ship in sight at the capture 'was' entitled to salvage (k); but King's boats sent in pursuit are not entitled; unless they actually assist in the capture (l); and where the co-operation or recapture is by the convoy ship, the question will depend on the degree of blame imputable to the convoy in first allowing the capture (m).

(3.) Derelict.—Property derelict is not under the English Salvage Acts, and there is no restraint as to the rate of salvage. It will therefore be allowed according to the merits of the case (n).

The Amount of Salvage is left to judicial determination in the case of derelict and shipwreck (a); in the case of recapture, the rate is regulated by statute (after many changes), at one-eighth for the Royal Navy and King's armed ships; one-sixth for private ships (b). 'The amount may be fixed by agreement at the time, subject to the power of a competent court to reduce or increase it to a reasonable sum (c).'

OF CONTRACTS FOR REPAIRS AND FURNISHINGS TO SHIPS; AND OF SHIP'S-HUSBAND, MASTER, AND SEAMEN

I. REPAIRS AND FURNISHINGS.

447. Contracts, how made.—Contracts for repairs and furnishings to ships may be made with the owners, with the ship's-husband, or with the master (a).

(a) As to the rights of part owners on the bankruptcy of one to retain the profits for advances made for the ship, see Smith v. De Silva, Cowp. 469. Holderness v. Shackles, 8 B. & C. 612; 32 R. R. 496. Glass v. Hutton's Trs., 1794; M. 2587. As to the rights of dissentient part owners in regard to the management of ships, see below, § 1330A, 449 (a).

448. Liability.—The owners are liable for stores and repairs pro rata when the contract is with themselves 'as a body acting together (a)'; singuli in solidum, when the order is by the master or ship's-husband (b), 'or by one of themselves, whose authority is proved (c)'. Of course one assuming to contract for himself or the ship with a person who is ignorant that there are other owners, is liable to the full extent for his own contract (d); but as part owner he has no implied general authority to bind his co-owners (e).'

The register does not furnish evidence to charge one as owner for furnishings or repairs, unless it be shown that the registry was made by his authority. The question always is, On whose credit was the work done (f)? A purchaser is not liable for orders given by, and furnishings previously made to, the seller of the ship; nor the seller for furnishings made on the order of the purchaser, though still the seller's name is left on the register (g).

For orders by the master, the actual owners or 'employers (exercitors)', having the use and control of the ship, not necessarily 'those whose names are with their own knowledge or consent left still on the register, are liable (h)', 'the register being merely evidence from which the jury may infer that the persons there named appointed the master (i).' The lessee of a ship for the voyage, or on time, 'if the owner be divested of possession and he has assumed the responsibilities of owner,' is liable for furnishings on the master's order (k). Mortgagees 'not' in possession, formerly held liable as owners, are now by statute freed, provided their character as mortgagees is stated in the book of registry, and in the certificate (l); 'or, more accurately, a mortgagee is not by reason of his mortgage to be deemed owner of a ship (m); but if he take possession and use the ship, he will be responsible on the principle above stated for repairs and necessities (n).'

450. Shipmaster.

(1.) Qualifications.—By ancient sea laws the shipmaster was required to be a part owner; and by some modern codes he must be examined and passed as sufficiently skilful. But in this country 'till lately' the only requisites 'were' the appointment of the owners, and that he must be a British subject. 'It is now imperative that the master and mate of foreign-going ships and home-trade passenger ships going to sea from the United Kingdom shall hold valid certificates from the Board of Trade (a). It is not necessary that a master shall be a British subject (b).' The master is employed as under a contract of hiring (c), but his office implies an important mandate,—the exercitorial power (d).

(2.) Appointment.—The master is seldom appointed by written contract, but by verbal agreement with the owners or ship's-husband. His name must be entered in the register and in the certificate at first registration of the ship; and no change is to be made of the master without an alteration in the certificate and on the register (e). His duties to the owners are undertaken by the mere act of taking his place as master; and so, in relation to third parties, he is vested with exercitorial power and authority (f).

(3.) Powers.—The exercitorial power confers on the master the sole direction of the course and conduct of the ship; the power to freight the ship abroad, not at home without express 'or implied' authority (g); and power, when the ship is advertised for general freight,

II. SHIP'S-HUSBAND, MASTER, AND SEAMEN.

449. Ship's-husband.—He is the agent or commissioner for the owners (a). He may be a part owner or a stranger. His powers are by a mandate, or written commission by the owners, or by verbal appointment; the latter chiefly where he is also part owner (b). His duties are, to arrange everything for the outfit and repair of the ship, stores, furnishings, etc.; to enter into contracts of affreightment; to superintend the papers of the ship. His powers do not extend to the borrowing of money (c); but he may grant bills for 'ordinary and necessary' furnishings, stores, repairs, and the necessary engagements, which will bind the owners although he may have received money wherewith to pay them. He may receive the freight; but is not entitled to take bills instead of it, giving up the lien by which it is secured. He has no power to insure for the owners' interest without special authority (d); 'or to order unusual alterations or repairs on the ship, such as lengthening, for he is agent of the owners not as proprietors, but as joint adventurers in the employment of the ship (e).' He cannot give authority to a law agent that will bind his owners for the expenses of a lawsuit (f); nor can he delegate his authority (g). 'The Merchant Shipping Act requires the name and address of the managing owner or ship's-husband to

to receive goods on board. 'He has no power to sign bills of lading for goods not shipped aboard (h); or to carry goods freight free (i), or for freight payable to another than the owner (k); or to discharge a claim of demurrage without payment (l). As to the outfitting of the ship, his powers are, at home, superseded by those of the ship's-husband; but his power is implied, unless the owners take the management, or there be a ship's-husband appointed (m). Abroad, the master is the accredited agent of the owners in fitting out, victualling, and manning the ship; in ordering necessaries; and even in borrowing money for necessaries, although he may have been provided with money by the owners (n).

'The limitations of the master's authority as agent may be more generally expressed thus: (1) He has no implied power to pledge the owner's credit at any port, at home or abroad, where the owner or his agent, able and willing to provide funds, is present or can be communicated with in reasonable time, regard being had to the engagements of the ship, or the usual and proper course of her employment (o); (2) This power extends, when it exists, only to the procuring of such things as are necessary and proper to enable the vessel to prosecute the voyage and course of trade in which she is engaged, and such as a prudent owner, if he were on the spot, would himself order (p).'

He has power 'in case of necessity and the failure of personal credit,' to hypothecate the ship, 'freight, and in extreme cases the cargo,' for necessaries (q); and his fault or neglect in performing his duties binds the owners to the extent of the value of the ship (r). He has no authority to sell either ship or cargo, unless under the pressure of the most extreme, absolute, and well-proved necessity, 'and inability to obtain the owner's directions'; otherwise the sale is null, and the owner will get back his property on payment of salvage (s). 'In ordinary circumstances, the master is a stranger to the cargo except for the purpose of safe conveyance; but in cases of instant and unforeseen necessity, especially in the absence of the owner, he may be bound to take measures, as if he were supercargo or agent, for the safety of cargo, by unshipping and reshipping, or otherwise (t). The extent of the master's authority (e.g. to make contracts to hypothecate the ship or cargo, etc.) is ruled by the law of the ship's flag, i.e. of the country to which she belongs (u). In all these points the master himself is bound, 'unless he takes care to confine the credit or obligation to the owners only (v).'

(4.) Dismissal.—The owners may dismiss the master at once and absolutely, leaving him to his remedy at law (w). 'In the absence of extraordinary cause there must be reasonable notice (x).'

451. Seamen.—By a statute of Will. IV., the former statutes relative to merchant seamen 'were' repealed, and the system placed on a new footing (a). This statute, 'which was repealed by the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 (b), had' two objects: 1. To secure to seamen, on the one hand, the benefit of a simple and equitable written contract, with exact payment of their wages, and summary and effectual means of recovering them; on the other, strict enforcement of the duties of seamen; and 2. To establish a regular office of registry for merchant seamen, with a system of apprenticeship by which the supply may be kept continually full of skilful seamen, and proper care be taken of the interest and safety of seamen while in foreign parts.

Questions may arise as to seamen's wages, in the decision of which it is necessary to have recourse to general principles of jurisprudence. Thus, according to the common maxim, "Freight is the mother of wages"; so that 'by the general maritime law' total loss during the voyage forfeits wages (c). This is a rule founded on policy for the additional security of ship and cargo. But it is subject to several exceptions, as when the voyage is lost by the fault of the owners; if the ship be seized for debt; if forfeited for having smuggled goods; if the ship returns without a cargo: and even when the ship is wrecked, but part of it brought home, the seamen are not to be deprived of all consideration for their services (d). 'And now, by statute, the right to wages is not dependent on the earning of freight; but in cases of wreck or loss of the ship, proof that the seaman has not exerted himself to the utmost to save the ship, cargo, and stores, shall bar his claim (e).'

The seaman has two remedies for his wages, — a personal action on the contract (f), and a lien on the ship to her last plank (g). On this right (especially as exemplified in the case of the Neptune), although the seaman 'might' lose his personal action for wages if the owners 'earned' no freight, he 'had' his claim against the ship or its vestiges.

(b) 17 and 18 Vict. c. 104, which superseded all the former legislative enactments. See below, § 451A-B. It has been held, in a question as to employers' liability (see below, § 547B), that the Merchant Shipping Act does not apply to firemen or stokers in canal boats, or, indeed, to such vessels themselves. *Oakes v. 451A. 'Under the existing statutes, there are at the principal seaports mercantile marine offices, under superintendents whose duty is to facilitate the engagement of seamen, by keeping registers of their names and characters, superintending their engagement, and securing their presence on board ship at the stipulated time, etc. The master of every ship, except ships of less than 80 tons, exclusively employed in the coasting trade, must, in engaging a seaman, enter into a written agreement, in a form sanctioned by the Board of Trade, specifying the nature of the voyage, amount of wages, and other particulars, and signed by the master before it is signed by the seaman (a). In the case of foreign-going ships, every such agreement made in the United Kingdom is to be signed by the seaman in presence of a superintendent or deputy-superintendent of a shipping office (shipping master), who must see that the seaman understands it, and must attest it. When the crew is first engaged, this agreement is in duplicate, one part being retained by the superintendent and the other delivered to the master. Some relaxation of these rules is allowed when the services of engaged seamen are lost within twenty-four hours before putting to sea (b). Engagements for home-trade ships may be made in the same way (c). Running agreements may be made for two or more voyages, in case of foreign-going ships making voyages averaging less than six months; provided they do not extend beyond the next 30th June or 31st December, or the first arrival at the port of destination in the United Kingdom, or first discharge of cargo after such date (d). And the owner of several home-trading ships may engage seamen to serve in two or more of said ships (e). Erasures, interlineations, and alterations in agreements are inoperative, unless attested to have been made with the consent of all parties by the shipping master, a justice of peace, officer of customs, or consul, or where there is none, by two respectable British merchants (f). No stamp is required (g). Stipulations by sailors forfeiting their lien on the ship, or depriving them of any remedy for recovery of wages, or abandoning right to wages on loss of the ship, or any right to salvage, are inoperative (h).'

451B. 'Seamen's Right to Wages.—A seaman's right to wages or provisions begins either when he commences work, or at the time specified in the agreement for his commencing work, or being on board, whichever first happens (a). Where his service terminates before the period specified, by wreck or loss of the ship, or by his being left on shore abroad under a certificate of his being unfit or unable to proceed on the voyage, he is entitled only to wages prior to such termination of his service (b). Wages are forfeited by desertion both at common law and under the Merchant Shipping Act (c). The fact of desertion must be entered in the official logbook of the ship, and that, with proof of the seaman's engagement, and his leaving the ship or absence from it, is prima facie evidence of it in any question of forfeiture of wages, and imposes on the seaman the onus of proving a proper discharge or a sufficient excuse (d). Illness, if the sailor remain with the ship, except illness caused by the sailor's own wilful act or default, and death, do not operate a forfeiture of wages; nor quitting the ship to enter the Queen's naval service (e). The statute provides for forfeiture of wages, or portions thereof, for certain offences and misconduct; for the discharge and settlement of claims of wages before the shipping master; and for the summary recovery of wages and effects by the seaman or his representatives (f). The statutory remedies do not exclude a claim at common law for damages by misconduct (g). Seamen's wages take precedence of all other charges (h). They cannot be arrested or before accrual assigned, and a power of attorney or authority for receipt thereof is not irrevocable (i).'

But this rule does not affect a bargain for extra remuneration for extraordinary risk or labour which the seaman is not already bound by his contract to undertake (b). The seaman is bound to remain with the ship on arrival in port until she is placed in security, under the penalty of forfeiting a month's wages (c); not, as formerly, until delivery of the cargo (d).'

It is an implied term in every contract for service on board ship that the owner, the master, and every agent concerned in loading, preparing, or sending the ship to sea, shall use all reasonable means to ensure the seaworthiness of the ship for the voyage at its commencement, and to keep her in such condition during the voyage. But it is a defence if it be proved that in special circumstances it was reasonable or justifiable to send the ship to sea in an unseaworthy state (b).'

CHAPTER XIV

OF CONTRACTS OF BOTTOMRY AND RESPONDENTIA

452. Nature of these Contracts.
453. Form.
454. Subjects.

455. Necessity.
456. Risk.
Marine Interest.

Security.
Average.

452. Nature.—Bottomry (a) and Respondentia are contracts for money lent to the owners of ship or cargo at home, or to the master in a foreign country, on the condition that if the subject on which the money is lent be lost by sea-risk or superior force of the enemy, the lender shall lose his money; and that if the voyage shall be successful, the money lent shall be repaid, with a certain profit or consideration for interest and risk called marine interest. For repayment, the person of the borrower is bound (b); and also, in bottomry, the ship. 'A bottomry bond by a master possessing only the ordinary powers, being by its nature founded on the maritime risk, is not a competent way of creating a personal obligation against the owners. The lender's security is the ship or cargo only, and the personal obligation of the master, who generally binds himself.'

In respondentia, the goods (in certain cases) are hypothecated to the lender. 'In respondentia, the obligation must be taken for the benefit of the cargo, and greater strictness will in general be observed (c). In particular, the master of a British ship must, if at all possible, communicate to the cargo owner the necessity not only for repairs, but for the proposed hypothecation (d).'

The master has 'in general' no power to borrow on such contracts in a home port, i.e. within the 'United Kingdom' (e), unless where there is a dissension among the owners, and a necessity of borrowing for the minority's share of the outfit. 'If the master can within a reasonable time communicate with the owners, even by electric telegraph, whether they be in the same country or not, it is his duty to do so; and if he fails to do so, a bottomry bond will be invalid (f). This being the test, the master may, where it is satisfied, borrow on bottomry, although the owner is in the same country (g).'

See Abbott, 109, 113; Smith's Merc. Law, 412. But a bottomry bond may be conceived as a collateral security merely, and discharged by acceptance or payment of bills drawn by the master for the same debt. The Nelson, 1 Hagg. 169. *Stainbank v. 453. The Form of the obligation is that of a bond, or of a bill 'of sale,' expressing the sum borrowed or credit given, with the marine interest; the subject on which the money is taken; and the risk, with its commencement and termination. A verbal agreement to give security on the ship will not do. And a bill of exchange is held as evidence that the ship was not intended to be pledged (a).

(a) Ex p. Halket, 19 Ves. 473. Abbott, 113. See Stainbank v. Fenning, Stainbank v. Shepherd, and Miller & Co., cit. § 452 (b). Compliance with the statutes as to registry of ship (see below, § 1381) seems to be necessary in the case of British ships. Abbott, 106. Smith's Merc. Law, 514. But see as to the competency of a bond of bottomry over a British ship lying in a British port, the Royal Arch, 1 Swa. Adm. 269; MacLachlan, 58.

454. Subjects.—There must be something at hazard on the voyage, in order to validate this contract. This may be the ship, with its furniture; the cargo; or the freight 'for the time included in the risk' (a). But wages cannot be made the subject of bottomry (b).

(b) Marshall, 587.

455. Necessity.—As bottomry loans are, strictly speaking, the creatures of necessity alone in the providing for or extricating the ship, the master cannot make an effectual transaction if there should be circumstances which do not evince such necessity; as for a debt of his own (a), or in security of a debt already existing on personal credit (b); 'or even for the release of the ship itself from arrest (c). But where a master has in a foreign port incurred personal debts for repairs or necessities, he may borrow money on bottomry from one not his creditor to pay such debts (d). Or in exceptional cases of extreme urgency, he may grant a bond of bottomry to his creditor if the repairs have been made or the debt incurred on the credit of the ship, i.e. in contemplation of a bottomry security (e).'

(e) The Alexander, 1 Dods. 279. The Laurel, 33 L. J. Adm. 17; B. & L. Adm. 191.

456. Risk.—This alone gives validity to the stipulation for marine or higher interest (a). Where the voyage is not begun, and no risk run, the transaction resolves into a common loan at lawful interest. When the borrower has no interest at stake in ship, goods, or freight, there is no marine interest. After the risk is over, the sum due on the contract bears only lawful interest. But if the risk have once begun, and the ship or goods in the bond have been exposed but for a moment to hazard, the marine interest is due (b). The risks are commonly specified in the bond. They are the same with those undertaken in a policy of insurance. It is not necessary that they should be set down in the bond, or even that the bond be expressly conditional, being understood and implied when the nature of the bond clearly appears (c). But in a question as to the risk run, the ship is held not to be totally lost, however much injured, if she reach the end of the voyage (d). 'There is not in respect to this contract any constructive total loss. Nothing but an utter annihilation of the subject hypothecated discharges the borrower on bottomry. The property saved, whatever it may be, continues subject to the hypothecation (e).'

Marine Interest.—The amount depends on the estimate made of the risk; for it is not so properly, or solely, interest, as pretium periculi. But that estimate may be exorbitant and oppressive under the pressure of the necessity which justifies the transaction; and courts of justice, though unwillingly, may undoubtedly interfere to reduce any such exorbitant charge (f). When the condition of the bond is fulfilled, the sum advanced and the maritime interest stipulated are demandable and become an absolute debt, on which the ordinary legal interest runs (g).

Security.—In bottomry, the lender has a privilege or claim on the ship itself, and on the freight. He is entitled to apply in Admiralty to have a sale of the ship for his payment (h). And in distributing the proceeds among those who may appear to claim, the last bottomry creditor in point of date is entitled to be preferred, as having furnished the means of preserving the ship for the benefit of all previous lenders,—“salvam fecit totius pignoris causam” (i). This preference, however, is given only when the loan has been made to the master abroad on necessity; for a later bond by the owners will not thus be preferred (k). ‘A bottomry bond is entitled to preference over all other creditors (except seamen, including the master, though part owner (l), for their wages), even over a mortgage (m).’ In respondentia on goods which are intended for the market, there can be no hypothecation inconsistent with that object (n). ‘Where the ship, freight, and cargo are all hypothecated, the cargo is not liable until the proceeds of the ship and freight are exhausted (o); and the owner of the cargo has relief against the shipowner (p).’

Average.—The risk and security which so intimately enter into the nature of this transaction lead to the question of the effect of average on the lender. He seems liable to general average, so as to be bound to contribute from the money which is saved to him by the sacrifice, to the indemnification of the sufferer ‘other than the shipowner’ (q); and he is, of course, liable to simple average, in so far as it may diminish the subject of his security.

I. INSURANCE GENERALLY.

457. Nature of Insurance.—Insurance is a contract to indemnify against possible or probable loss, in consideration of a sum or premium paid, or held to be paid (a). ‘Contracts of insurance are invariably embodied in “policies.” The Stamp Act provides that no contract of sea insurance is valid unless expressed in a policy; and imposes penalties on those receiving premiums except on duly stamped policies (b). It also imposes a penalty on any one who receives or takes credit for any premium or consideration for any other insurance than sea, and who does not within one month make out and execute a duly stamped policy (c).’ The insurer undertakes to be responsible for certain risks or perils of the sea, fire, death, etc., to which the party insured may be exposed; being assured, in doing so, that he is free from such other risks as may either arise from the natural or actual condition of the subject, or out of a deviation from the usual course of peril. It is essential to the contract of insurance that there shall be a subject in which the insured has an interest, a premium given or engaged for, and a risk run.

458. (1.) Subject.—The subject insured must be a thing at hazard. And it is held to be so, although it may have already perished, ‘or been injured, or have arrived safely,’ if this be unknown at entering into the insurance (a). And in all ‘marine’ policies, to avoid such questions, the words “lost or not lost” are inserted. So, when a ship or person abroad, or a house in a distant part of the country, is insured, in the belief of their being still extant, the insurance is effectual, 'even to cover a loss sustained before the insured's interest had been acquired, as in the case of goods sold at sea (b).'

459. It is not necessary that the subject should already belong to the insured: it is enough if it exist in spe; as profit to be earned (a) 'upon goods in which the insured has already an interest (b)'; the produce of a fishing voyage (c); 'salvage (d)'; or freight, 'even on a time policy which expires before the freight can be earned (e)', the interest commencing with the ship breaking ground (f). The merchant himself, who sends his goods by sea, has an insurable interest in any advances made to the shipmaster, provided the same be insured as freight, or the repayment made to depend on the earning of freight (g).

460. The insurance must be of a lawful subject of trade. Thus, smuggled goods cannot be insured, nor contraband of war; neither can seamen's wages (a), nor what is paid in place of wages (b). Enemy's property is not insurable; and so, if war have begun before the policy is effected, it is null (c); if war break out afterwards, no action will lie on the policy 'for a loss happening before the war' while the war continues, but its effect 'as to such a loss' will revive on peace (d). Although a good policy when made, it will not protect against British capture if war break out (e).

(e) See Furtado's Case.

461. (2.) Interest.—The subject insured must be one in which the insured has an interest (a); but that interest need not be specified in the policy (b). "Interest" is not limited to property, but extends to every real and actual (c) advantage and benefit arising out of or depending on the thing to which it refers (d). But one cannot insure a mere expectancy (e).

And this is enforced by the statutes against wager policies, and against policies for covering illegal and criminal voyages. Those statutes prohibit assurances "by way of wagering or gaming," and assurances "interest or no interest, or without further proof of interest than the policy," "by way of gaming or wagering, or without benefit of salvage to the assurer" (f). The interest must be proved otherwise than by the words of the policy (g). But these rules, in marine assurances, apply only to the ships of the Crown or of its subjects, not to foreigners (h). The effect of stopping in transitu a cargo insured, has in one special case been held to destroy the policy, as annihilating the vendee's interest under it (i). But this does not decide the general question, 'whether stoppage effects a rescission of the contract.'

462. (3.) Risk.—The subject must be actually at risk, or it must be bond fide believed to be so (a). And it must be a risk not occasioned by the fault or crime of the insured. So, in life assurance, death by duelling, suicide, or the hands of justice, are not risks under a policy for the benefit of the person or his family whose life is in question, though by special stipulation some of these risks may be included (b). Certain risks are, by special agreement or usage, excepted out of the underwriter's responsibility. In marine insurance, stores and certain perishable articles are by memorandum excepted, unless there be total loss, or stranding, or loss to an amount beyond the average damage to perishable commodities in such a voyage (c). So extra risks in ordinary fire policies are excepted, and certain diseases in life insurance. The risk must have arisen within the time specified or event referred to in the express or implied agreement of the parties (d).

(d) Park, 31. Marshall, 191.

463. (4.) Premium.—This is the consideration given, at entering into the contract, for the engagement to make future indemnification. It is presumed to be paid; the policy bears the receipt of it; and, as between the contracting parties, it is held as paid, entering as matter of account into their respective relations with the policy broker (a).

(a) Marshall, 268.

463A. 'Subrogation of Insurer paying, and Contribution.—In the case of insurances on marine and fire risks, or of moneys lent or deposited, which are contracts of indemnity, the insurer, on making payment to the insured, whether of a partial or a total loss, is subrogated in his place, and has, on grounds of equity (and not because in the case of total loss the property of any remnants vests in him), the same right which the insured possessed to sue for damages a wrong-doer who caused the loss, and a right to recover from the insured any damages paid to him. In short, the insurer is, on payment, entitled to enforce all the remedies which the insured has against third parties, to compel them to make good the loss insured against, and to obtain from the assured, who can never be more than fully indemnified under the insurance contract, whatever advantage he may have received from such remedies (a). This includes contribution between different insurers to the same person on the same interest (b). But in life and accident insurance, where the contract is an absolute agreement to pay a sum certain on the occurrence of an event, the insurer has no concern with any damages or compensation which the insured may be able to claim aliunde (c).'

II. MARITIME INSURANCE.

464. Description.—Maritime insurance is a contract of indemnity against loss by perils of the sea, fire, enemies, pirates, arrests by kings or states, barratry.

465. Constitution of the Contract.—Although this ranks as a consensual contract, a written instrument, on stamped paper, is by statute requisite to its constitution (a). In practice there is a previous note of the contract, called a "Slip," made out for the purpose of collecting the consents of underwriters to the proposed policy. It is intermediate and temporary, and held only to contain a confidential expression of the intention of the persons who sign by their initials to subscribe the policy. But to each party, while the policy is unsigned, there is locus penitentiae. The slip has 'by the Revenue laws' no force as a contract of insurance, 'and under the former statutes on this subject, which prohibited unstamped agreements or contracts for insurance to be given in evidence, was' held ineffectual to show even priority of subscription (b).

These enactments, however, are repealed, and it is now the law that a contract or agreement for sea insurance shall not be valid unless expressed in a policy; and any one attempting to insure or be insured against sea risk, unless by a duly stamped policy, incurs a penalty (c). Hence a slip is not valid or enforceable in any court; but it may be given in evidence wherever it is, though not valid, material; e.g. to show the time when the risk was really undertaken, after which—on the ground that by usage the contract, though of imperfect obligation, and not enforceable by reason of the positive rule of evidence in the statute, is complete when the slip is initialed—the policy is not avoided by non-disclosure to the insurer of material facts becoming known to the insured (d), or to show the intention of the parties (e).

'It was stated in former editions that' another preliminary proceeding is frequent, which has a different effect. Great insurance companies (f) engage by agents at a distance, empowered to take risks, that policies shall be sent; this intermediate engagement binds the company, and an action is competent for delivery of the policy (g). 'But since the Act of 1867 (h), which first enacted the rule above referred to, this doctrine appears no longer to be correct; and such agents, unless they have power to issue policies, cannot bind the company (i). Yet an agent's knowledge of material facts affecting the risk may affect the insurers (k).'

466. Policy.—This is an ill-drawn and very loosely expressed instrument, but in all its material points now settled by precedents. It must be subscribed, either by the party himself undertaking the risk, hence called Underwriter; or by one authorised to sign for him by written authority or mandate, or at least sanctioned by acquiescence. The subscription is often made by one acting as agent or broker for many underwriters. 'The policy is not valid unless it specifies the particular risk or adventure, the names of the subscribers or underwriters, and the sum or sums insured; and is made for not more than twelve months (a).'

(1.) Stamp.—The policy must be duly stamped when effected (a). 'Formerly' the stamp 'could' not afterwards be supplied, 'but policies of sea insurance may now be afterstamped, for the purpose of production in evidence, on payment of a penalty of £100 (b). Policies made out of, but in any way enforceable within, the United Kingdom, are subject to the stamp duty, and may be stamped at any time within ten days of the time when they are first received in the United Kingdom on payment of the duty only (c). Nor can the agreement be materially altered, after it has been fully executed and completed (d). But to this rule there is, by the statute itself, an exception, that the policy may be altered before the determination of the risk is known; provided that the thing insured shall have remained the property of the original insurer; that there shall be no prolongation of the term of insurance 'beyond the period of six months, or beyond twelve months in all where the policy is originally for a term of more than six months,' or extension of the voyage; and that no additional 'or further' sum shall be insured by 'reason of' the alteration (e). Under this exception, an alteration of the time of sailing has been allowed (f); and even of the voyage itself, where the ship was detained beyond the stipulated time of sailing (g). But it has not been permitted to alter the insurance from "ship and outfit" to "ship and goods," as being an entire change on "the thing insured" (h). A correction of an innocent mistake is held no alteration (i); and even a waiver of the warranty of seaworthiness has been held no alteration requiring a new stamp (k). 'Contracts by carriers by sea and others undertaking risks attending goods on board ship, or to indemnify the owner for loss, are contracts for sea insurance under the existing Stamp Act (l).'

467. (2.) Construction.—The policy is to be construed according to its plain sense and meaning, as collected from the terms made use of, taken in their ordinary and popular meaning; unless either by the known usage of trade, or by the force of the context, they are to be understood in a peculiar or technical sense (a). Part of it being printed and part written, the definite meaning fixed on the former is to be taken; the latter construed according to the obvious intention of the persons who have selected them; 'and the written words, being selected by the parties, control the printed and formal parts of the policy (b).'

468. (3.) Name of Insured.—By statute (a), every policy is void in which there does not appear the name of the persons interested; or of the consignor or consignee; or of the person residing in Great Britain who shall receive the order for, and effect such policy; or of him who shall give the order to the agent employed to effect the insurance. It is not enough that the policy bears the name of the master or broker as such; but it is sufficient if there be the name of one employed to represent a true interest, by effecting the policy (b). It is not necessary that an agent shall be named as such (c). A broker who is not general agent for the insured, is within the statute if described as agent (d).

469. (4.) Name of the Ship.—The ship is described by her name and the name of the master. This is for the purpose of identifying the risk; and so, if the name of ship or captain should be mistaken, without any doubt as to the identity, this would not be fatal; though, to prevent all dispute on that subject, it is commonly added, "or by whatever other name the ship shall be called," and "whoever else shall go as captain." Under such a clause, an innocent mistake, when there is clear proof of the identity of the ship intended by the parties, does not vacate the policy (a). Goods may be insured by the policy, generally, as goods on board ship or ships, provided they shall be afterwards identified as those understood by the parties. This has been long settled (b).

(b) Kewley v. Ryan, 2 H. Blackst. 343; 1 Ill. 317; 3 R. R. 408. See below, § 470.

470. (5.) Specification of Subject.—Generally speaking, the subject of maritime insurance is the ship, or cargo; but under this is comprehended as fit subjects of insurance the freight to be earned by the ship, and the profits to be effected on the sale of the cargo; and besides these, the bottomry and respondentia interests that may exist with regard to either. But although it is indispensable that the insured have an interest in the voyage, it is not necessary to specify the nature of such interest in the policy (a), 'if it be immaterial to the risk, i.e. unless the peculiar nature of the interest alters the risk insured (b).'

Whatever be the subject, it must be so clearly described that there may be no doubt as to identity. Thus the ship must be identified (c); and when insured with "the body tackle, boats, and other furniture," this will comprehend the provisions on board at the date of the policy (d). The goods are identified by the ship, or by their marks or other description. When the insured does not know by what ship the goods are to be sent, he insures goods by "ship or ships"; and as there are many occasions on which both ship and goods are unknown, in such cases a valid insurance 'called an "open policy"' may be effected "on goods to be afterwards declared and valued by ship or ships," the declaration being made by showing an embarkation of goods for behoof of the insured (e). When goods are mentioned generally, it is held to apply only to such as are exposed to the ordinary risks—'not extraordinary risks,' as being loaded on deck, 'unless such goods are' usually so loaded (f). Profits may be insured under that general term (g); and freight may be insured provided it is done expressly (h); and under freight may be covered the benefit one derives from carrying his goods in his own ship (i). 'Advances of freight may also be insured (k).'

Bottomry and respondentia interests may also be insured, but they must be so specified, and will not be covered by an insurance on goods (l).

471. (6.) Commencement and Termination of Risk.—There must be no uncertainty as to the commencement and termination of the risk (a). These must be clearly set forth in respect both of time and of place.

Commencement.—The expression “at and from” covers all perils while the ship lies at the place mentioned (b); the risk beginning on the ship at the time mentioned; or date of the policy, if no time be stated; or if “from a port,” with her breaking ground. ‘Delay in arriving at the port prevents the policy from attaching, if it be such as materially to alter the risk (c).’ If the insurance be on freight “at and from a port,” it begins with the ship being ready for her cargo, ‘which has been bought or contracted for and prevented from being received or carried only by the perils insured against; or with her having begun to do something under a charter-party or contract to take the cargo on board with a view to its fulfilment (d)’; with the loading, if the insurance be of goods; not however, covering goods already on board, before the commencement of the risk (e), unless either so specified or plainly implied (f). At and from an island or district, protects a ship sailing from port to port in that island or district for loading, if the whole be held as one place (g).

The course of the voyage must be according to the order of ports and places, and for the purpose mentioned in the policy, or as sanctioned by usage (h); ‘and the risk does not attach if the ship sails for a port not included in the policy (i).’

Termination.—When the insurance is to a district or island, the voyage (as to the ship) determines at the first port (k) at which she stops to unload (l), unless a stipulation be added insuring her to her port of discharge (m). Goods are protected till arrival at the port of delivery. The usual termination for the ship is, “till moored twenty-four hours in good safety,” which means, that if no loss or damage happens within the twenty-four hours (or a term of quarantine), for which the underwriters are liable, they are discharged (n). On goods the policy usually is, “till safely landed,” which covers them till landed in the way which usage sanctions (o).

In a policy on time, the period is by statute restricted to twelve months (p); and in construing the policy, the Courts have gone as far as possible in favouring the intention of the parties (q). ‘If a ship insured for time is injured by the perils insured against within the time, but the extent of the damage is not ascertained till the time has expired, the ship being kept afloat till then, the insured may, it appears, recover under the policy (r).’

472. Risks insured against.—These are:—

(1.) Perils of the Sea; by winds and waves, lightning, rocks, sands, collision of ships, etc. (a); but damage by indirect consequence is not included (b): a species of worm infesting the rivers of Africa was held not a loss by sea peril; 'apparently on the principle that in the circumstances the damage fell within the category of wear and tear in the ordinary service of the ship (c). Insurance is for protection against casualties, and so underwriters are not liable for loss by inherent defects of the subject insured, or by the natural and regular action of the tide, or even by the chemical action on it of the sea water, etc. (d).' Damage to living animals by agitation of the waves has been held loss by peril of the sea (e); 'but not their death or deterioration without fault from want of food, nor injury to goods caused by delay arising from bad weather on the voyage (f). The policy includes losses of the kinds above indicated, although they were partly due to the negligence of the ship's crew, if not barratrous (g). The expression "perils of the sea" means the same whether it occurs in a charter-party, bill of lading, or policy of insurance (h).'

(2.) Fire.—It is not every loss that happens at sea which is covered by insurance; but fire is expressly included in the policy, and is covered by the insurance (i), provided, as to goods, it do not arise from the unfit condition of the goods at embarkation (k).

(3.) Enemies (l).—This applies to capture by public enemies in war; and in a question of insurance it is not necessary that there should be condemnation, or even carrying intra præsidia (m); for the insurer is liable whether the property be changed by the capture or not. The cases may be either of total or partial loss, as the ship or goods are recaptured and restored or not (n); but the insurer is liable to the loss in both cases.

(4.) Detention of Princes, etc.—By kings, princes, and people, is meant not enemies merely, but those in amity, 'and of the nation of the assured (o)' also; and not a riotous assembly of people, but a national act (p).

(4a.) Pirates, Rovers, and Thieves.—Acts of piracy are all hostile depredations done at sea without the commission of any state, or beyond the limits of a commission. The English law of piracy includes all such acts committed at sea as would be felony if done on land (q).'

(5.) Jettison.—The damage or loss suffered in this way is covered by the usual words of the policy, and indeed is strictly a loss by dangers of the sea (r); and the claim for indemnity is not limited to the strict case of average contribution, but extends to all jettison ex justa causa (s). 'The insured may claim indemnity for a loss of this kind without having sought contribution from the parties liable, leaving the insurer to stand in his place in the general average adjustment (t).'

(6.) Barratry.—This is a peril brought into the policy by special stipulation; for it may be said to be inconsistent with the true relations of the parties, that insurers should answer for the fraud of those appointed by the insured (u).

(7.) Other Perils.—Difficulties having arisen as to many cases not included under the words of the policy, a sweeping clause of "all other perils" was introduced (v). This comprehends such a case as a ship fired on by mistake from a British cruiser (w), a ship in dock blown over by a land breeze (x), 'but not the explosion of a steam boiler, or the bursting of a pump, or apparently any casualty which is not fairly described as a marine loss, and is not ejusdem generis with those enumerated (y).'

(7a.) 'Running-down Clause.—Under the ordinary form of policy, insurers are not liable for losses arising from the liabilities imposed on a shipowner by modern rules of law requiring an equal division of the damage in cases of collision (z), for loss of life, personal injuries, loss or injury of goods on board, and for similar losses and injuries occasioned on board another vessel by that insured. But since De Vaux v. Salvador the policy contains a clause by which the underwriter undertakes the risk of three-fourths of all damages which the shipowner may have to pay in case "the vessel shall by accident or negligence of the master or crew, run down or damage any other ship or vessel," etc. A question arose, and was differently decided in England and Scotland, whether this clause in its original form covered damages paid for loss of life or personal injury to individuals on board either ship (aa); but stipulations excluding such liability, and dealing with the expenses of contested claims, are now added (bb). It has been held to apply where the collision was with the tug towing the insured ship, the latter having had to pay damages (cc).'

(8.) Exceptions—The Memorandum.—The difficulty of distinguishing between loss by tear and wear, or by the natural quality and inscrutable decay of certain commodities, has led to the exception by a memorandum, saving the underwriter from all partial losses, "average, unless general," on corn, fish, salt, fruit, flour, and seed, except by jettison or stranding of the ship; and from partial loss under a certain rate on sugar, tobacco, hemp, flax, hides, and skins, unless by general average or stranding (dd). 'This memorandum exempts the underwriter from making good any partial loss whatever within its terms, even including expenses and freight incurred in forwarding the subject-matter of the insurance when it is not in danger of total loss (ee). But as there can be no partial loss of freight, this does not exclude the insured on freight, who earns his freight by forwarding the goods in another ship, from recovering the freight in such ship from the underwriters, under the suing and labouring clause (ff).' The chief doubt relates to stranding (gg), 'but it is held under the clause "unless the ship be stranded," that if the ship be stranded the underwriter pays for the articles in the memorandum, whether the loss on them is occasioned by the stranding or not (hh)'; and in regard to this, the ship must be rendered immovable on the strand; and the stranding must be occasioned by some extraordinary or accidental occurrence, and not merely by the ship taking the ground in the usual course 'of navigation' in a tide river or harbour, though in doing so she should be injured by some hard substance (ii). Such an accident, however, may give indemnification for loss on goods not within the memorandum. In questions under the memorandum, 'in a policy on goods or a time policy on a ship (kk),' two distinct occasions of loss are not to be combined to bring up the average with the percentage; nor is the total loss of some part of the goods under the memorandum to be reckoned as a partial loss on the whole (ll), 'unless the goods be made up in packages separately insured, or be of different species (mm).'

473. Obligations of the Insured.—The insured proposes to the insurer a seaworthy ship, engaged in a lawful voyage, and safe previous to the time at which the insurance is to commence. The insurer, taking all this for granted, estimates the dangers of the sea and enemy, takes into view all circumstances affecting the risk,—all floating rumours and political speculations,—and fixes, as in a wager, the sum at which he will take the risk of indemnifying the insured for loss. The former of these being conditions precedent, are incumbent on the insured; and if not true, or not observed, the insurance is null. The latter are points of information for calculating the perils of the voyage, and, so far as the knowledge of them depends on the insured, affect the contract only if misstated or concealed, being material to the risk. Thus (besides an obligation to pay the premium, as already mentioned) the insured is under obligations in respect to representation, and to warranty (a).

(a) Behn v. Burness, 3 B. & S. 751; 32 L. J. Q. B. 204.

474. Representation (a).—Insurance is a contract of good faith, in which the insurer, in calculating the risks to be run, greatly relies on the statement of the insured. The statement is called a Representation, which, whether fraudulent or innocent (b), if material to the risk, must be 'substantially (c)' true, or complied with, otherwise there is 'in the option of the insurer' no insurance (d). 'The contract, however, continues valid till the party misled has elected to avoid it (e).’ The information given must not be conjectural where the knowledge is certain; nor given as certain when it is conjectural (f). In respect to materiality (which is a question for the jury on the evidence of persons conversant with the subject), it is of chief importance to ascertain whether the statement was an inducement to undertake the risk (g). ‘The rule is that all should be disclosed which would affect the judgment of a rational underwriter governing himself by the ordinary principles and calculations of his business (h); and although the concealment or misstatement be of a fact not directly material to the risk, but yet material to guide the underwriter’s judgment (e.g. of misconduct or fraud of the insured in regard to former policies), it suffices to avoid the policy (i).’ There must be no misrepresentation; no false insinuation; no concealment of circumstances material to the risk ‘which the underwriter is not presumed to know, or of which he has not waived further information’ (k); no false ground of speculation suggested by the representation of the insured, however innocently made (l). So an error or misleading of the underwriter as to the day of sailing will be fatal (m); or as to sailing with convoy, or making a running voyage (n); or as to the arrival of the ship (o). All intelligence, in the sense of mercantile men on such points, must, if material, be disclosed (p). The doctrine that a misrepresentation to the first underwriter in a material point is a misrepresentation to all, though held in one case in England, is to be received with much hesitation, and with strict regard to time and circumstances (q). ‘An innocent insured is affected by the fraud or neglect of such agents as his shipmaster or ship agents, leading to his ignorance of a fact (e.g. the loss of the ship) of which he ought to be aware, and of which it is their function to inform him (r). The non-disclosure of material facts known to the agent or broker employed to effect the particular insurance, though not known to the principal, will also entitle the insurer to avoid the contract (s). What is expressed as a statement of opinion or expectation, not of actual facts, will not avoid the policy, unless it be fraudulent (t). The insured need not mention what the insurer knows—scientia utrinque par pares contrahentes facit—or ought to know; what he takes upon himself the knowledge of or what he waives being informed of (u). And here the insurer is affected by the knowledge of his agent effecting the insurance (v).’

There are some points, however, which it is not necessary to describe or mention—as the draught of water of the ship; or depth of a harbour; or common reports, and matter of general notoriety; or public and political speculations and events (w). Neither is the insured bound to state particulars relating to the ship,—her age, build, construction, repairs, etc. (x).

(c) See Arnould, 530. But if there be fraud, a trivial discrepancy will avoid the policy; and greater strictness is required in regard to some statements, e.g. as to time of sailing. See below, note (m), etc. Alexander v. Campbell, 41 L. J. Ch. 478.

475. Warranty.—This is an absolute condition, express or implied, relative to the state or circumstance of the subject insured; which, if not 'strictly and literally' true, or not 'strictly' complied with, defeats the insurance, whether material to the risk or not (a). The insured is not bound to disclose what is the subject of 'and covered by' a warranty (b).

A warranty may be affirmative, as that a ship was safe on a particular day; or promissory, that the ship shall proceed with the convoy, or sail on a day certain, etc.; and whether of the one nature or of the other, they are either express or implied.

476. Express Warranties.—These are in the body, or on the face, or margin, or bottom of the policy, or in some print or writing incorporated with it (a). Warranty being an absolute condition, it follows that express warranties must be literally fulfilled; and it is not a good answer to say that the state of things was represented truly, according to the belief of the insured: for no ignorance or bona fides is an answer to the fact that the condition has not been observed on which alone the insurance was made (b). So a warranty to sail on a day certain imports that the ship shall be ready to sail, unmoored, and on her actual voyage (c); and it must be literally complied with (d). A warranty to depart on a certain day, means that she shall be out of port on that day (e). A warranty that the ship is safe on the day of signing the policy, warrants her safe, not at the moment of signing, but some time during that day (f). A policy on a ship "at and from" is a warranty that the ship is at the place mentioned, or will be there shortly, 'or at least within such a time that the risk shall not be materially varied (g)'; and a delay of arrival, 'or her arrival in so disabled a state as to be a wreck (h),' will be fatal (i). To sail with convoy, imports that she shall sail from the rendezvous with a convoy for the voyage of the regular naval force appointed by Government for that purpose (k), and that she will keep with the convoy during the voyage (l). 'The breach of warranty and the loss do not need to be connected: so, the loss being by shipwreck, breach of warranty to sail with convoy is a good defence (m).'

477. Implied Warranties.—The chief implied warranty, and the most important, is—

(1.) Seaworthiness.—This 'warranty—which is a condition of the contract, and the breach of which affords a good defence to the insurer, whether of ship, freight, or cargo (a), whether the loss can be traced to the breach or not (b), and irrespective of the shipowner's honesty or negligence in the transaction (c)—' implies that the ship, 'not lighters for landing the cargo (d),' shall be stout, staunch, and strong for the voyage 'at the commencement of the risk' (e); well and sufficiently rigged 'and equipped,' and with a proper master and crew (f). Seaworthiness is presumed, so as to lay the onus probandi on the underwriters (g); 'and it may be admitted by them, so as to exclude them from disputing it in an action on the policy (h).' In order to make out this defence, it will not refute the presumption should the underwriter prove that the ship became unseaworthy after the risk began (i). But if the ship spring a leak, or go down without adequate cause, it will, 'in the absence of other evidence, and especially if it occur soon after sailing,' overcome the presumption, and infer 'as a matter of fact' want of seaworthiness (k). It is not enough under the warranty of seaworthiness that the insured has had the ship carefully inspected, or fully and expensively repaired. If the ship in point of fact be not seaworthy, no previous care or bona fides is an answer to the failure of the condition. 'Seaworthiness is a relative term, depending for its meaning and effect on the nature of the ship and cargo, as well as of the voyage, insured; and it may even be of different degrees in regard to different parts of the same voyage (l). It is settled that there is no implied warranty of seaworthiness in a time policy (m); but underwriters may have a remedy in respect of unseaworthiness under such a policy, on the ground of wilful concealment or the like (n).'

478. (2.) Non-deviation (a).—A warranty against deviation is not, like seaworthiness, a condition precedent, but a promissory warranty; and it resolves into a defence grounded on a departure from the engagement not to deviate.

(a) See this more fully stated below, § 492.

(b) It is printed thus, not "insured," in all the editions; but the sentence appears to be inconsistent with § 494, etc. It is probably a hasty jotting, and it is not easy to say what is meant.

479. Barratry.—Although it appears inconsistent that underwriters on a ship should be liable for the wrongs done to the owner by a master and crew selected by himself, the importance of full indemnity has led to an express stipulation in all policies, that the underwriters "are contented to bear" losses from "barratry of the master and mariners," i.e. those which proceed from any fraudulent and illegal act by which the interest of the owners shall suffer (a). To constitute barratry, the act must be fraudulent. Thus, when the master runs off with the ship, or enters into any smuggling concern, or evades duties to the loss of the ship, or sinks or deserts the ship, or criminally delays or defeats the voyage; all such acts done with a criminal intention are barratry (b). 'But an act is not barratrous if done merely negligently, though it may be in contravention of statutory rules for navigation; nor unless it is done without the owner's consent; but an act done for his benefit without his consent may be; for a master has no right to commit an illegal act even for his owner's advantage, and he must be presumed to have forbidden it (c).' The master or crew alone can commit barratry (d), and against none but the owners or general freighters (e). If the master be owner, he cannot commit barratry against himself; neither can it be the ground of claim against the underwriters, if consented to by the owner (f). Barratry may be committed by the owners or master against the general freighter; or with consent of the freighters against the owner, if unknown to the party injured (g). A difficulty has been raised as to barratry by a master, himself a part-owner only. But it would seem that no exception could be taken against the claim of the other part-owners, not participant in or consenting to the act, more than to the claim of a freighter on the barratry of the owner, or of the owner on barratry with consent of the freighter (h).

The loss must take place on barratry during the voyage or time limited by the policy, though not necessarily in the very act of barratry (i). In a policy on goods, it is a total loss from the moment that the goods are taken out of the possession of the assured. It is not necessarily so as to the ship (k).

480. Total Loss is an expression not to be taken strictly; as if it were requisite to a claim of indemnity under the contract, that the ship should go to the bottom, or the goods be entirely lost. Insurance is a contract for commercial indemnity; and a ship is constructively held to be totally lost where it cannot be repaired, so as to proceed on her voyage, at a reasonable expense (a); or goods totally lost where the object of the voyage is defeated.

This effect of the contract necessarily implies (in cases where the loss is total only constructively) that the wreck of the ship or the vestiges of the goods shall be given up or abandoned to the underwriter (b). But where the loss is manifestly and absolutely total (as where a ship is sunk, and never heard of again), there is no other question than whether it be a loss within the policy; there is no room or necessity for abandonment (c). "Though it has been said that a loss by perils of the sea cannot be total if the thing exists in specie, yet that must be taken only to mean if it exist for any useful purpose; for if a ship be so battered as to be rather a congeries of planks than a ship, or if the cargo be so damaged as to exist only in the shape of a nuisance, in such cases the loss is total without abandonment" (d). Where the insurance is on freight, 'and the voyage is lost by a peril insured against, so that the insured cannot earn the freight, the loss is total, and' no abandonment is necessary, 'for there is nothing to abandon (e)'. Where the loss is only constructively total (as where portions of the wreck are left, but useless to the insured), the claim for indemnification must be accompanied by abandonment (f).

(f) See below, § 485.

481. Total loss may be Valued or Not Valued. In the one case the policy is called a valued policy; in the other, an open policy. In the one, the amount is fixed which the parties agree to be the value on a loss; in the other, proof must be given of the amount. But there is no difference between them as to the question whether the loss be total or partial (a).

(a) Lewis v. Rucker, 2 Burr. 1170; Tudor's L. C. 225. Thellusson v. Fletcher, Doug. 315. Allen, § 480 (a).

482. (1.) In a Valued policy, the sum specified, 'or the proportion of it corresponding to the whole intended cargo, if only a part of the cargo is on board at the time of the loss (a)', is demandable on a total loss occurring, 'however the value of the ship may have been diminished before the loss (b), provided that' there is no fraud, and where the policy does not exclude proof of interest; investigation being open to the insurer, to ascertain whether there be fraud (c). 'For all the purposes of the contract the valuation in a policy is conclusive between the parties; and it results from this, and from the principle that marine insurance is a contract of indemnity, that the insured can recover in an action on a valued policy only the balance of the sum in the policy, after deducting what he may have received under other policies (d). At first, it was conceived that the provisions of the statute of 19 Geo. II. c. 37 comprehended all valued policies; but it was afterwards settled that it includes only those in which all proof of interest was dispensed with (e).

483. (2.) In an Open policy, proof must be given by the assured of the extent of the loss; the rules as to the adjustment of which will be found below (a).

(a) See § 500-7. Tobin v. Harford, cit. § 482 (a).

484. Abandonment is a relinquishment to the underwriter, in a case of loss constructively total, of all right, title, and claim to what may be saved; leaving it to him to make the most of it for his own benefit (a). 'It operates as an assignation (b).'

(a) In some countries the right to abandon is limited to certain definite cases. In Hamburgh, only when the ship is missing; in France, on capture, total shipwreck, or stranding and wreck, or arrest of princes. In Great Britain and America, it is admitted in all cases where perils within the policy occasion loss of the ship; or of the voyage, in an insurance of goods.

485. (1.) Cases for abandonment, generally stated, are: where the voyage is lost, or not worth pursuing; where the thing is so damaged, that it is of little or no value to the owner; where the salvage to be paid is very high; where the articles saved are not worth the freight; where, 'even although the ship may have reached her destination and earned her freight (a),' further expense is necessary, to a greater amount than the insured will defray, or the insurer undertake, 'or, rather, than an owner of prudence and discretion, if on the spot and uninsured, would incur' (b). But more particularly—

Capture is prima fronte a total loss, for abandonment; provided the cause of capture or detention be a risk within the policy (c).

Where the loss is by sea risk, the insured is entitled to abandon for total loss, not only where there is certainty, but where there is great probability, of total loss. But a distinction is to be observed between ship and cargo. Insurance of the ship is for indemnity by loss of the ship on the voyage (d): Insurance of the cargo is for indemnity of loss of the goods or of the intended market; it is insurance of the cargo and of the voyage. Defeat of the voyage is total loss to the merchant; but it is not a total loss to the owner of the ship (e). But as to goods, it cannot be said in absolute terms, where there is an exception freeing the underwriters from particular average, that loss or retardation of the voyage is a total loss for abandonment; unless some such great injury or damage be sustained by the subject of insurance as to render it of no value, or such as to entitle the insured to abandon (f).

486. (2.) Abandonment not Compulsory.—The insured cannot be compelled to abandon. But when entitled to do so, he must, 'unless perhaps where there is nothing to abandon, and the notice can be of no use to the underwriter,' give notice within a reasonable time; that is, the earliest opportunity. 'He may not lie by, waiting to see the state of the markets, or the chances of recovery; and if he unduly delay to abandon, although he may have communicated with the underwriters, he may be held to have elected to treat the loss as partial' (a). Although not compelled to abandon, however, he cannot claim for a constructively total loss without abandoning (b). He is not bound to do so till he has an opportunity of having correct information (c); but the underwriters are entitled in the meanwhile to take precautions against further damage. 'Notice of abandonment is not necessary, when by capture or seizure abroad the subject of insurance is entirely taken out of the power and possession of the insured (d).'

487. (3.) Notice.—It is sometimes a question whether the abandonment is conclusive;—as where a ship has been captured, but is restored; or has been reported as lost. There are two points of importance: 1. Notice of abandonment; 2. Acceptance.

Notice of abandonment is a mere offer, which becomes a contract, transferring the property and settling the interest of the parties, when it is accepted; 'and no particular form is required (a).' But before acceptance, if what appeared a total loss becomes not so, as by recapture, recovery, or partial preservation, the policy then is for indemnity only of a partial loss (b). 'The question whether there has been a total or a partial loss is determined by the condition of the ship when action is raised (c).' When the notice is accepted, the contract is irrevocable, the property, 'with all its incidents, including in the case of a ship the right to freight due or to be earned for carrying the goods of others, although insured with other insurers and to the exclusion of their claim (d), but not prepaid freight (e),' is transferred, and the underwriters must stand by the abandonment (f). 'If after abandonment the insured recovers any part of the insured property, e.g. earns freight after recapture, he is accountable to the underwriters for it or its value (g).'

488. (4.) Duties of Masters.—The state of things on occasion of a loss constructively total, accompanied by abandonment, exposes the underwriters to abuses. The ship or goods injured, but still worth something, are in the power of a master and crew selected by the insured, while the underwriters are at a distance. But the master, though he continues accountable to the owners, is liable to the underwriters as their agent in case of abandonment (a): And the rule of his conduct is, that he can sell ship or cargo only in a case of absolute necessity, and in the exercise of a prudent discretion, as if there were no insurance; or when the ship cannot be repaired at the place where she lies, or the necessary supply of money obtained; or where goods cannot find freight to their market, or are so damaged that they cannot be sent on, or from their nature and condition cannot be kept for an opportunity (b).

489. Partial Loss (also called Average Loss) includes damage by stranding; striking on a rock; collision by inevitable accident; loss of boats, masts, yards, etc., by force of the wind and waves; loss while the vessel is before the wind, or lying to the sea; capture, though recaptured; loss and defence, etc., against enemy. Among these, stranding has given occasion to frequent questions, from the mention of it in the memorandum clause, where certain perishable articles are excepted from the insurance, unless on general average, or the "stranding of the ship" (a). 'If, after a partial loss has been incurred, the vessel is totally lost during the period of the risk, for which the insurer pays, he cannot be called on also to pay for the partial loss, for he has fulfilled his obligation by paying for the total loss. So, if after a partial loss the vessel is totally lost by a peril not within the policy, the insurer pays for the partial loss only so much as the insured has actually lost, as by expenditure in repairing the damage (b). But in the event of a total loss after the period covered by the policy, the underwriters must pay for a previous partial loss, because their liability is fixed as at the expiration of the risk insured (c).'

490. Return of Premium (a).—Where no risk is run, the premium must be returned: But where the risk is once begun, it is not returnable; and where the assured have been guilty of fraud, they are barred personali exceptione from asking back the premium; while fraud by the underwriter will entitle the insured to restitution of the premium. So, where any warranty relative to the state or condition of the ships has not been observed, and there is no fraud, the premium is returnable (b): Or where the voyage has never been begun (c), there is a return of premium.

For short interest there is a return of premium; as for goods stated in the policy, not sent; or short profits: but there can be no return 'under a valued policy' for the goods being of less value (d).

When the policy is void without fault, as by war, before signing, but unknown at the time, 'return is due (e). But a policy on an illegal voyage is invalid, and there can be no return of premium after the risk has commenced (f).'

When the policy is on an entire voyage, and it has begun, there can be no return of any part of the premium (g). But if two or more distinct voyages are included, and any of them not begun, there will be a partial return (h). Fraud on either part will affect the right to premium; so fraudulent misrepresentation by the insured will bar the claim for a return after the commencement of the voyage, on account of the absence of risk; and so also fraud of the underwriter will ground an action for recovery of what has been paid (i). Sometimes the parties stipulate in the policy for a return of the premium, or part of it, in certain cases. This, of course, forms the rule between them (k).

491. Defences of the Underwriter.—The underwriters are discharged of the contract—

1. By misrepresentation or concealment on the part of the insured; 2. By breach of warranty; or 3. By deviation.

(1. and 2.) Misrepresentation (a) of material facts, and Breach of all such warranties as are conditions precedent (b), annul the contract ab initio. Breach of promissory warranties and deviation do not thus annul the contract, but discharge all further operation of the policy. In the former cases the risk never has begun, and there is a right to demand return of the premium, unless the insured has been guilty of gross fraud; in the latter, the risk having been once begun, there is no return of premium (c).

(a) See above, § 474.

(c) See above, § 490.

492. (3.) Deviation.—The risk is calculated on the regular course of the voyage; and it is an implied warranty that this course shall be observed. From the moment of deviation, the rest of the risk under the policy is discharged, while the underwriter is liable for loss previously incurred (a).

As a breach of warranty, deviation must actually have taken place, in order to ground the defence of the underwriter. Instruction or intention to deviate is therefore not enough, if the vessel has not reached the diverging point. If a voyage to a given place be insured, and when the ship sails it is not intended actually to go to that place, she is held not to have sailed on the voyage insured, though lost in the fair way of that voyage (b). But when the ultimate termini of the voyage on which the ship sails are the same as those described in the policy, it is held that the voyage is the same up to the point of divergence; and that if the voyage terminate before reaching that point, there has been only an intention to deviate. Total loss, therefore, before the dividing point is covered; while in case of partial loss, evidence must be shown of the proportion of damage occurring before that point (c).

If a deviation have once been made, for however short a time or space, the return of the ship in safety to her course will not revive the policy, so as to subject the underwriter for subsequent loss (d).

493. According to the fair construction of the policy, it is a deviation to depart from the shortest and safest course of the voyage, or (where it is a known and ordinary voyage) from the usual course (a). 'The insurers are discharged if the risk be varied, although it may not be increased (b): nor is it material that the subsequent loss should be connected with the deviation (c).' Inverting the order in which the policy allows the ship to call, or touch, or enter port (d), is deviation, unless altered according to any known, regular, and settled course (e). Where there is no order of successive ports fixed by the policy, to invert the geographical order, unless sanctioned by usage, is deviation (f). So it is also to go to a port mentioned in the policy, but out of the order of the voyage, or for a purpose different from that specified, and not subordinate to the voyage described (g). To stay at any port an unusual time is a deviation; but leave to touch at a port is leave also to trade there, if there be no delay thereby occasioned (h). To linger unreasonably, and for purposes not in the policy, is a deviation (i). These questions of delay are for the jury (k).

494. Departure from the course may be justified by necessity, provided the new direction into which the ship is forced is pursued in the direct course (a). Such necessity is pleadable from stress of weather, or approach of an enemy, or inevitable accident, or compulsion by a King's ship (b). To go into port for a supply of water or necessary provisions is not a deviation; even though goods should be taken in, provided this does not, directly or indirectly, increase the risk (c). To join convoy is a necessity justifying deviation from the usual course (d). To avoid a port which has become hostile, or has been laid under embargo, will justify a deviation, provided the voyage is not relinquished, and another destination taken; but if the voyage be relinquished, the underwriters are freed (e). In such a case it may seem most prudent to go into the next port, and there do the best possible for all concerned; but this, if not provided for (which it generally is), will not be a voyage under the policy (f). Whether the interruption be a risk within the policy, entitling the insured to abandon, is a different question (g). Letters of marque will entitle a merchant ship to chase an enemy, but not to cruise (h); nor to lie to for bringing the prize into harbour; all deviations of this kind requiring special licence (i). A delay of the voyage, or deviation from the course, to save or aid a ship in distress, or to save life, 'seemed to Professor Bell' to be justifiable (k), but not for the purpose of saving goods wrecked; 'and there was till recently no clear decision on the subject in any British Court. It has recently, however, been held that a deviation to save property merely is not justifiable as between ship and charterer (or insurer); and it seems, though not so decided, that a deviation to save life is justifiable (l).'

495. If the voyage insured have never been entered upon, but the vessel have sailed on a different voyage entirely, the risk is not run, the policy is annulled, and the premium must be returned (a). And although, where a vessel is insured at a port, and preparations have been begun for the voyage insured, the risk is begun, and a subsequent deviation will discharge the policy without giving a right to a return of premium; yet if preparations for a different voyage have been begun, and the ship is afterwards lost at the port before sailing, the policy will be discharged without any return of premium (b).

496. Loss.—The claim of the insured involves two points: 1. That the loss has happened within the policy; and 2. That it is either total loss; or, if the policy is not valued, a partial loss to the amount claimed. The burden of proving these points lies on the insured.

(1.) Proof.—The great rule is, that the best proof is to be given which can in the circumstances be had (a).

The log-book and protests must be shown to the underwriters; but they, if extant, are not properly evidence, unless by the loss of better evidence they become necessary. They may be used to contradict the master or mate; and the log-book, on the whole, is a check rather than proof (b). The same holds as to protests: they are not proofs, but may be used as checks to contradict other proofs, and may occasionally supply the loss of the log-book, if they bear that book to have been shown to the magistrate (c). Surveys may be made evidence by being sworn to. And parole evidence is competent; as of the master, etc. (d).

497. Proof afforded in these modes,—that the ship sailed with the cargo insured; that she never arrived at her port; and that she was reported to be lost and the crew saved,—is held sufficient proof of loss, without the necessity of calling, or proving the absence of the crew (a).

498. (2.) Adjustment of Loss (a).—In adjusting losses, it is necessary to distinguish between valued and open policies.

(a) See Losh, Wilson, & Bell v. Martin, 1856; 19 D. 101. As to a foreign adjustment, see Power v. Whitmore, 4 M. & S. 141. Harris v. Scaramanga, 41 L. J. C. P. 170; L. R. 7 C. 499. The adjustment on a valued policy is at the sum expressed, if there be proof of interest, or such proof at least not excluded, and no fraud (a).

500. In adjusting losses on an open policy, the general rules are:—

501. That in a total loss the ship is taken as at the commencing port; stores, wages advanced, and premium of insurance, included. The loss on freight is the amount of the manifest, or freight list, covered with the premiums, etc.

(a) Stevens on Average. Benecke on Indemnity. Lewis v. Rucker, 2 Burr. 1167; Tudor's L. C. 225.

503. In a partial loss, 'the depreciation in' the value of the ship is to be taken, deducting one-third from new materials and labour (a). 'That is to say, the insured has made good to him the depreciation in the value of his vessel at the end of the risk, so far as that is caused by the perils insured against. In general the sum properly expended in repairs, or the estimated amount of expenditure, is the measure of this depreciation, under deduction (by settled custom of trade), in the case of wooden ships, of one-third of such cost of repairs in respect of the benefit received by the shipowner in getting new materials instead of old (b). But if the insured sells his ship unrepaired, he cannot recover under his contract of indemnity a larger sum than the depreciation in value as ascertained by the sale (c).'

(c) Pitman v. Univ. Ins. Co., 9 Q. B. D. 192; 51 L. J. Q. B. 561.

504. In valuing the cargo, two methods are followed: Either the invoice is taken, with premium, etc., and the nett proceeds of the sale of the damaged goods are deducted; or the amount of the sales is compared with a pro forma account of the same goods taken as if sound. The former is called a salvage loss, on the analogy of salvage; what is paid being as a redemption from total loss. The latter method avoids involving the underwriter in a falling or rising market; the market price of the sound and of the damaged commodity being said to be the scales in which to weigh the depreciation (a). 'The rule is thus stated by Lord Mansfield: that, the insurer being bound "to indemnify the merchant to the amount of the prime cost or value in the policy, if the goods arrive, but lessened in value through damages received at sea," he puts "the merchant in the same condition which he would have been in if the goods had arrived free from damage, that is, by paying such proportion or aliquot part of the prime cost or value in the policy, as corresponds with the proportion or aliquot part of the diminution in value occasioned by the damage" (b). Thus, if the value in the policy was £100, and the goods at the end of the voyage would have realised £200, but sold as damaged for £150, then the diminution in value (£50) is one-fourth, and the loss to be made good is one-fourth of the value in the policy, or £25.'

(b) Lewis v. Rucker, cit. § 502 (a). Smith's Merc. Law, 474.

505. Reinsurance.—Although there can be no insurance without an interest, it is not necessary that the insured shall be owner of the thing insured. An underwriter who has insured a ship or goods has an unquestionable interest in the voyage, which, on the common principles of indemnity, he is entitled to protect by insurance. Accordingly, in most of the countries of Europe, and in America, underwriters are allowed to secure themselves against the loss which they may dread under a policy which they have entered into, by opening a policy with other insurers to re-assure them against loss (a). But the dread of the insane speculations of the time of George II. led to a statute by which this remedy was forbid, except on occasions of the insolvency or bankruptcy of the insurer, or in case of his death; confining it, in short, as a remedy only to creditors or executors (b). 'That statute, however, has been repealed, and there is now no statutory prohibition of reinsurance (c). It is not a concealment voiding the policy to omit to state that it is a reinsurance (d).'

There are two sorts of reinsurance;—that sort which was contemplated in the above-mentioned statute; and as a reinsurance to the underwriter, or a policy against any loss that may arise under a subsisting policy. Such a policy, unless in the excepted cases, 'was' unlawful, not only when effected by a native, but when entered into with a foreigner (e).

Another form of reinsurance is by the insured against the possible insolvency of the underwriters on his policy. This, although not falling under the prohibition of the statute, seems never to have come into practice in this country (f), and indeed is better effected by double insurance.

506. Double Insurance.—This is a remedy to the insured, who effects insurance of the same risk with more than one set of underwriters. He may sue on both policies to the effect of complete indemnity (a). But he cannot draw full indemnity under both policies; for that would amount to a wager policy in the one or the other.

(a) Davis v. Gildart, Marsh. 104.

507. The policies are all considered as making only one policy, and there is contribution and relief among the several underwriters; the underwriters who pay being entitled to come into the place of the insured to receive rateable contribution from the others (a).

III. INSURANCE AGAINST FIRE.

508. Policy and Premium.—A policy of insurance against fire is a contract for indemnity against losses by fire, occurring within the time limited in the policy, in consideration of a sum paid, or of an annual payment. The contract must be by policy on stamped paper (a). But the agreement may be so conclusively fixed before delivery of the policy, as to ground an action for implementing it by the furnishing of a regular policy (b); 'for there is not, as in the case of sea insurances, a statute requiring the contract to be embodied in a policy, though those engaging in such a contract without executing a policy are subject to a penalty (c).'

(c) See above, § 465. 54 and 55 Vict. c. 39, § 100. See Rossiter v. Trafalgar Ins. Co., 27 Beav. 377.

509. Interest.—There can be no lawful policy of insurance against fire without an interest: it would be a wager policy of the most dangerous description. The interest may be as proprietor (a); as creditor (b); as pledgee of goods; as holder of a lien; as factor with a balance due; as a consignee having made advances (c): 'and even a custodier, e.g. a wharfinger, not responsible to the owner of goods for accidental fire, may, in the absence of an express limitation in the policy to goods for which he is responsible, insure and recover the full value, being trustee for the owner so far as the sum insured exceeds his interest in respect of his own charges, (d).'

A mere agent without possession or a lien has no insurable interest, and an insurance effected by him is void. Bunyon on Fire Ins. 15.

510. Risk.—The risk is, of fire, or of loss by means of fire, within the stipulated period, and not excepted in the policy (a). So all damage produced by fire consuming or damaging the property is to be indemnified under the policy. But it is not held a loss by fire if there be no ignition, as in heat by effervescence, or injury by the overheating of a flue (b); 'or injury from concussion caused by the explosion of a neighbouring gunpowder magazine (c).'

There is in the policy an exception of fire occasioned by the invasion of a foreign army, or by usurped power, or civil commotion (d).

511. Incidental loss or damage is within the policy; as damage in the removal of furniture, or by the falling of a wall injured by the fire, or by water used to extinguish a fire (a). 'Professor Bell held it' doubtful whether one insuring his house possessed by a tenant can claim for rent as part of his loss (b); 'but it is now settled that, unless they are expressly insured, a fire policy does not cover remote losses, such as those arising from want of occupancy, loss of profits, or payment of wages to servants thrown out of work by the destruction of the property (c).'

512. Duration of the Policy.—The efficacy of the policy is limited to a certain day. 'A policy from a certain day to another day specified covers the whole of the latter day (a), and none of the former day (b).' Sometimes by the policy fifteen days beyond the proper day of expiration are added, during which it is provisionally declared that the policy shall subsist on payment of the premium. And it has been held that this only gives an option to the insured to continue the insurance, by paying the premium within the fifteen days, notwithstanding any intervening loss; provided the office had not already given notice that they would not renew the contract (c).

513. Conditions of Payment of Loss.—

Insurance offices against fire generally issue printed proposals, which are by reference incorporated with the policy. It 'was' a stipulation common in such proposals, 'now in disuse,' that the insured 'should,' before claiming for loss, produce a certificate of good character from the ministers, etc., of the parish. The wrongful refusal of such certificate has sometimes given rise to a question whether it be indispensable; and it has been held an absolute condition (a). 'The insured is generally bound as a condition of his claim to give notice of loss within a certain time, and deliver full particulars (b).'

Another condition commonly stipulated is, that the insured shall give notice of any other insurance effected on the subject, so as to afford the means of contribution, otherwise the policy shall be void. This condition also is effectual (c).

'Conditions against the introduction of steam-engines, or changes in the nature of the business carried on in the premises, are to be literally construed and enforced (d).'

Another stipulation is against loss by invasion, foreign enemy, or military or usurped power; and in more recent proposals, loss from "riot, tumult, and civil commotion" is added as an exception from the undertaking. This condition saves the underwriters from losses by invasion or by riot (e). But there is a remedy under the Riot Act, and underwriters paying such a loss may sue in the name and with the consent of the insured (f).

Where a clause provided that if there be "other insurances, whether effected by the insured or any other person covering the same property," the company should be liable to pay only its rateable proportion, it was held that the contribution could be extended only to those who insured the same interest in the same property, and so that there was not contribution between the insurers of a first and a second heritable creditor. *Scot. The doctrine of representation and warranty applies to the case of fire insurance as well as maritime (a) 'and life insurance' (b).

515. Extent of Loss.—

Fire policies are not properly valued policies. They limit, but do not measure, the liability for loss. The loss must be proved, and every possible means of detecting fraud exposed (a). The settlement is on the principle of an average loss, not on the principle of abandonment. The underwriters pay not for what has been expended, but only for what is lost to the amount of the sum insured (b); which may be ascertained judicially, or by arbitration, or amicably. 'An option may be reserved to the insurer to pay the loss or reinstate (c). The impossibility of fulfilling the obligation to reinstate emerging after election made, is no defence to the company (d), nor the fact that sums sufficient for reinstatement have been paid to other insured interests (creditors) by other insurers, but not used for reinstatement, the value of the subject having been sufficient at the date of the fire to cover the claimants' loss (e).'

III. c. 78, in the 83rd section, provides that insurance offices may, on the requisition of any one interested, insist on seeing the money of such insurance laid out on rebuilding. Although this be a public Act, it is an English, or more properly a London Act, and does not extend to Scotland. See Bisset, supra (a); and op. cit. in Westminster Fire Office v. Glasgow Prov. Invt. Soc., 1888;

516. Assignment of Policy.—Fire policies are in England not assignable at law, but they are in equity: they are assignable in Scotland, provided the interest goes with them (a).

517. Floating Policies against Fire.—Factors, warehousemen, printers, and others, who have great stores of goods entrusted to them, find it of great advantage to have their warehouses protected against loss by fire, as affording safety to those who employ them. For that purpose they effect a general or floating insurance, applicable to all goods that may be in their warehouse. And although the owner of the goods cannot, under such a policy, be said to be a party to the contract, the insured is allowed to sue on the policy, if he can show that, by contract, or usage, or the course of dealing, he is liable to the owner for the goods. There are other policies effected on similar views, but still more extensive, upon goods belonging to the insured or with him in trust, in all or any of the warehouses, cellars, or granaries in a certain city. To these the same general doctrine applies (a).

IV. INSURANCE UPON LIVES.

518. Nature of it.—Insurance of lives is a contract, not of indemnity, like sea and fire insurance, but of mutual risk (a); where one engages to pay a certain sum in the event of the death, or an annuity during the life, of a particular person, in consideration of a premium paid at once or periodically.

(a) Dalby v. Ind. & Col. L. A. Co., 15 C. B. 365; 24 L. J. C. P. 2; 3 Ross' L. C. 718; 2 Smith's L. C. 232. Law v. Lond. Indisp. L. P. Co., 1 K. & J. 223; 24 L. J. Ch. 196. Angell on Fire and Life Insurance. Bunyon on Life Insurance.

519. Stamp.—The policy must be stamped (a).

(a) 55 Geo. III. c. 184. 54 and 55 Vict. c. 39, Sched., and § 91, 98, 99 sq. See above, § 457.

520. Interest.—There can be no valid insurance on life without a pecuniary interest, the policy being limited to the interest 'at the time of effecting the insurance'; and the insured is not entitled to recover more than the amount of it (a). A father has no insurable interest in the life of his son (b). In a policy opened by one on his own life, his family has an interest sufficient; and as it is assignable, it is useful as a fund of credit. After the creditor is satisfied from another source, such a policy is available to the debtor, or to his creditors generally. It is sometimes made absolute during the whole life of the person insured; sometimes only for a certain number of years.

(a) 14 Geo. III. c. 48, § 1, 2, 3. Hebdon v. West, 3 B. & S. 579. Seagrave v. Union M. I. Co., 35 L. J. C. P. 172; L. R. 1 C. P. 305. (b) Halford v. Kymmer, 10 B. & Cr. 724; 1 Ill. 324; 3 Ross' L. C. 725; 34 R. R. 553. Innes v. Equit. Ass. Co., 10 B. & Cr. 727. Shilling, supra (a). But if the insurers pay, the money belongs to the father. Worthington v. Curtis, 1 Ch. D. 419; 45 L. J. Ch. 259. See as to insurances on lives of children in Friendly Societies, 59 and 60 Vict. c. 25, § 62 sqq.; as to claims by third parties paying contributions to Friendly Societies, Cruikshank v. Munro, 1875; 19 J. of J. 502, 2 Sel. Sh. Ct. Ca. 185 (Dove-Wilson, S.S.).

521. A creditor has an interest in his debtor's life, in so far as the payment or security of the debt may depend on the continuance of his life. And he may either himself open a policy on his debtor's life, paying the premium, or he may get assigned to him a policy opened by the debtor on his own life (a). A policy of the former kind has been held to fall on the debt being paid from another source (b); but there 'seemed' to be much reason to question the principle of this decision 'which was afterwards overruled' (c); and in cases where the creditor 'had' drawn a dividend from his debtor's estate, insurance offices 'were in use, even before the decision in Dalby v. The Indian and Colonial Co., to settle with the insured for the whole sum, and not merely for the balance, as in an indemnity. 'It is now settled that the only effect of the statute is to make the assured value his interest at its true amount.'

when he makes the contract; and that a subsequent cesser of the interest does not avoid the policy (d). But as under the statute the insured can recover no more than the amount of his interest, payment to a creditor of the amount of his debt is a bar to his recovering the sum insured for the same interest in other policies (e). It is a question of intention, to be proved by the circumstances of each case (in whatever form the policy may be taken), whether a policy taken or assigned in a loan transaction has been so taken or kept up for the benefit of the creditor, and to the extent of his loan only, or for the benefit and at the expense of the debtor, so that, quoad the surplus, it falls within his estate (f). So, an agreement that a creditor shall effect a policy and the debtor pay the premiums, prima facie, means that the equitable property in the policy is in the debtor, subject to the security; for what the debtor pays or agrees to pay for is presumably his (g).'

The interest is not to be reckoned by the actual value of the life, or diminished to the creditor by collateral securities. While the debt subsists, the policy is good, leaving the collateral securities to be otherwise available (h). 'Assignees of life policies may sue upon them in their own names (i).'

(i) See 30 and 31 Vict. c. 145, which gives the same power in England.

522. Representation and Warranty.—The same rule prevails with respect to representation and warranty as in other insurance (a). Every material fact 'known to the insured' must be disclosed. It will not relieve from the effect of failure to disclose 'all facts within his knowledge which can reasonably be supposed to influence the judgment of the insurers,' that the omission was innocent, 'i.e. not fraudulent'; and it is a question for the jury whether it be material (b). 'The representations made must be true not only at the time when they are made, but when the risk begins; and if a material change of circumstances occurs before the insurance is made,—if, e.g., that be understood to be at the issuing of the policy or the date of payment of the premium,—it must be disclosed, and, as the risk is not the same, the insurer may refuse the insurance, even if he have accepted a previous proposal (c). Innocent misstatements by the assured, i.e. misstatements which involve no negligence or want of fair consideration for the interest of the insurers, are not fatal to the policy, unless the truth of the statement be made a warranty or condition of the contract (d). Policies often contain a provision that the declaration of the insured shall be the basis of the contract, or a condition precedent of the contract, or the like; and in that case (such declaration not being limited to the knowledge and belief of the assured) the contract is avoided if any of the statements contained in it be untrue, whether known to the assured to be untrue or not (e). Such a warranty or condition is a ground of reduction even against onerous assignees of the policy (f). But in the case of an insurance on the life of another party, that party is not, in the absence of express conditions or adoption of his statements, agent for the insured, so as to make the latter responsible for his fraud or concealment, or that of the referees (g).'

523. Suicide, Duelling, etc.—There is usually a clause declaring that death at sea, or by suicide, duelling, or the hand of justice, shall not be held as a risk under the policy. Such events have been held, even without express stipulation, fatal to an insurance effected by the guilty person, and not available even to his creditors (a). But the objection will not annul a policy effected by a third party interested. 'The condition that the policy shall become void if the assured shall "commit suicide" or "die by his own hands," receives effect whether the insured be sane or not at the time of death; for if it were effectual only where the assured is of sound mind and the act is therefore felonious or a crime (b), the condition would be obviously superfluous (c). If there be no such express condition, suicide of the insured while insane does not void the policy (d); and the exception sometimes added to the condition, that the policy shall be good to the extent of any bona fide interest vested in a third person at the time of the insured's death, is valid, even though that interest should be merely a lien without any assignation (e). Death in a foreign country, unless excepted, 'or even when excepted, if the exception be waived, as by receipt of premiums after notice (f),' is a risk under the policy.

CHAPTER XVI

OF THE CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACTS

524. General Rule.
Ambiguities.
Special Rules.

524. With all the care which can be taken, disputes will arise as to the meaning of contracts; and construction is the art of collecting from proper indications what the parties held out to each other as their meaning and intention in the contract, and what, in concluding their contract, they mutually agreed to, understood, and relied on.

'A Court cannot construe a contract which is so vague as to be no contract. No agreement is a contract unless its terms are certain, or capable of being made certain by reference to some standard which the parties had in their minds (a).'

The General Rule is, that the words, according to their plain meaning and obvious intent, are to be taken as conclusive of the mutual intention of the parties; and that constructive or explanatory evidence is to be admitted only where the words are ambiguous and the agreement uncertain (b). Words expressive of engagement, when proved by a writing executed at the time, furnish the clearest of all indications of intention. Wherever this precaution of writing has not been followed, and witnesses are to be relied on, the object of the inquiry at the trial must be to get from them as nearly as possible the words made use of.

Ambiguities.—There are two kinds, which are to be dealt with differently: An ambiguity patent or apparent on the face of the contract, which, unless it can be solved by the context and nature of the contract, may be fatal: And a latent ambiguity, arising not from the words,

But in bargains there is so much taken for granted, so loose a confidence, so vague an adoption of usage, so great uncertainty as to the ordinary understanding in such cases, and so much ambiguity and imperfection of language, even where the identity of the words is not disputed, that courts of justice are frequently compelled to make an election between different meanings, and sometimes to admit the evidence of usage to qualify the whole. 'It is a golden rule of construction, that the grammatical and ordinary sense of the words used is to be adhered to, unless that would lead to some absurdity, or some repugnancy or inconsistency with the rest of the instrument, in which case the grammatical and ordinary sense of the words may be modified, so as to avoid that absurdity or inconsistency, but no further (d). In other words, the more literal or natural construction does not prevail, if it is opposed to the intention as manifest and apparent by the rest of the instrument (or statute), and if the words either are sufficiently flexible to admit of another construction consistent with that intention, or clearly appear to have been used by mistake. The construction must be made upon consideration of the entire instrument, and greater regard is to be had to the clear intent of the parties than to any particular words (e).'

Special Rules.—The rules seem to be,—

place (f) and time, is to be followed, unless the words be technical, 'or have a special meaning affixed to them by usage of trade (g).'

(2.) That technical words are to be taken technically, if no doubt can be entertained of the meaning and application: And for their meaning, usage may be resorted to (h).

(3.) That the sense which gives validity and effect to the agreement is to be preferred to that which invalidates or defeats it (i).

(4.) That usage enters into, extends, limits, and qualifies contracts, especially in matters of trade. But the usage must be consistent with law (k) 'and with the terms of the contract (l), and reasonable (m)'; and either general, universal usage; or usage of the particular trade or line of dealing: or, if local, known and relied on by both parties; and when it is so, it tacitly enters into the contract (n). 'Usage, or a course of dealing between the parties, may enter into and qualify a contract (o); and subsequent usage operates (by way of personal bar) to put a meaning on what is ambiguous, or even to add to the contract (p).'

(5.) That words, however general, are to be confined to the subject and matter of the agreement contemplated by the parties (q). 'So, when a particular enumeration is followed by such words as "or other," the latter expression ought, if not enlarged by the context, to be limited to matters ejusdem generis with those specially enumerated. The application of this rule, and whether it applies at all, in every case depends on the precise terms, subject-matter, and context of the clause under consideration (r).'

(6.) That in the several contracts, sale, location, etc., the naturalia of the particular contract are tacitly part of the agreement (s); 'but in unusual and innominate contracts conditions are not implied (t).'

(7.) That if the meaning and import of the agreement is to be collected from what has passed in correspondence, the meaning is to be taken according to the import of the whole (u). And if a series of conversations and communings, or of letters, has resulted in a distinct written agreement, all previous correspondence and communings are discharged 'and excluded from consideration' (v).

(8.) That the true point of inquiry in all doubtful cases is not (as in a will) the intention of one party, but that meaning of the terms made use of which the adverse party understood, and on which he was entitled to rely (w).

(9.) 'But while "communings," i.e. what parties said and did while a contract reduced to a distinct agreement was in negotiation, are to be disregarded in construing it, it is sometimes necessary and proper to look at the surrounding facts and circumstances, and therefore to have evidence of them, in order to judge of the meaning of the words, and their application to the subject-matter of the agreement (x). It may even be necessary to consider the whole correspondence and facts to ascertain whether what seems to be an agreement was really such according to the true intent of the parties (y).'

In Davies v. Davies, 36 Ch. D. 359, it was held that a covenant by a retiring partner to retire from the business so far as the law allows was too vague to be enforced.

BOOK FIRST

PART II

OF RIGHTS ARISING FROM IMPLIED OBLIGATIONS INDEPENDENT OF CONVENTION

INTRODUCTION

525. Amid the accidents of human life many invasions of right occur, and many grounds of action for redress are required which are not derived from convention or express contract. The Roman lawyers, instead of contemplating the rights encroached upon or violated, were accustomed to refer all personal actions to obligations express, or implied, or presumed; and they made three classes of constructive obligations, corresponding to the rights invaded. Those included—

1. Obligations arising quasi ex contractu; 2. Obligations arising ex delicto; 3. Obligations arising quasi ex delicto. Without following the subtleties connected with this arrangement, it seems to be simpler to consider all such grounds of action, on account of rights invaded, under the heads of Restitution, Recompense, and Reparation of Injuries.

CHAPTER XVII

OF RESTITUTION, REPETITION, RECOMPENSE, AND NEGOTIORUM GESTIO

I. RESTITUTION.

526. General Rule.
527-529. Stolen Goods.
530. Goods got by Mistake, etc.

II. REPETITION.

531. General Rule.

532. Special Rules.

- (1.) Natural Obligation.
533. (2.) Knowledge of no Debt.
534. (3.) Error in Fact or Law.
535. (4.) Compromise, etc.
- (5.) Judgments.
536. (6.) Payment to True Creditor by Wrong Debtor.
537. Periculum and Sale.

III. RECOMPENSE.

538. Meliorations.
539. Remuneration for Services.

IV. NEGOTIORUM GESTIO.

540. Nature of it.
541. Rules.

I. RESTITUTION.

526. General Rule.—The law gives an action of restitution against one in possession of the property or goods of another without his consent (a); or who has, in consequence of error, received payment of money not legally due to him (b).

- (a) 1 Stair, 7. 3 Ersk. Pr. 1. § 5. 3 Ersk. 1. § 10.
(b) See § 531. Kinniburgh v. Dickson, 1830; 9 S. 153.

527. Stolen Goods.—For things stolen, the owner who has been unlawfully deprived of them has an action not only against the thief, but against third parties, who may even have purchased them in bona fide, or received them in pledge. In such cases an obligation arising from the natural duty of restitution is presumed (a). The only doubt which disturbs the simplicity of this rule arises from the sanction due to a sale in public market. In England, this overcomes the right of the true owner (b); but it is not so in Scotland (c). With us the privilege of public market 'was under the former law' of force only to overcome the landlord's hypothec, in regard to corn sold there in bulk, and not by sample (d).

But if a purchaser in public market (e) have fairly disposed of the thing to another before any claim made by the owner, he will not be bound to restore to the owner the price which he has received, unless in so far as it shall exceed what he himself paid; to which extent he is a gainer by the loss of the original owner (f).

Kilpatrick*, 1680; M. 9120. Henderson v. Gibson, 1806; M. Moveables, Apx. 1; 1 Ill. 327. See Ramsay v. Wilson, 1666; M. 9113. Pringle v. Gribton, 1710; M. 9123. Todd v. Armour, 1882; 9 R. 901. Sale of Goods Act, § 22 (3).

(d) See below, § 665, 1242, 1318-21.

(e) The judgment in Faulds v. Townsend, 1861, 23 D. 437, seems to extend the doctrine of this paragraph to any purchaser in good faith and without negligence.

(f) 3 Ersk. 1. § 10. Scott v. Low, 1704; M. 9123. Walker v. Spence, 1765; M. 12,802. Faulds v. Townsend, cit. Todd v. Armour, cit.

528. It is an exception to the above rule of restitution, that money, bank-notes, and bills payable to the bearer, or blank indorsed, cannot be vindicated against one who acquires them in bonâ fide, 'i.e. without notice, or means of knowing wilfully disregarded, that the previous holder was not a bonâ fide holder (a), in the course of trade. In such case, the property passes with the possession (b).

(a) In the sense of the Bills of Exchange Act, a thing is deemed to be done in good faith if it is in fact done honestly, whether it is done negligently or not. 45 and 46 Vict. c. 61, § 90. See 1 Smith's L. C. 472, 734.

(b) Crawford v. Royal Bank, 1749; M. 875; 1 Ill. 327; 1 Ross' L. C. 229. Swinton v. Beveridge, 1799; M. 10,105. Lambton & Co. v. Marshall, 1799; M. Bill, Apx. 6; 1 Ill. 231. Scott & Co. v. Kilmarnock Bank, Feb. 27, 1812; F. C. See 1 Smith's L. C. 455 sqq; and above, § 333A et seq.; and below, § 1333. The Act 19 and 20 Vict. c. 60, § 15, is repealed by the Bills of Exchange Act.

529. But if one in lawful possession of a thing sell it to another without notice, the sale is good (a).

(a) See below, § 537.

530. Goods got by Mistake, etc.—One who by mistake has received anything (as from a carrier) is liable in restitution; and so one to whom a thing has been transferred, or an obligation undertaken and fulfilled, on a consideration which has failed, is also liable to restitution under the condition, causa data causa non secuta (a).

II. REPETITION.

531. General Rule.—Whatever has been delivered or paid on an erroneous conception of duty or obligation may be recovered on the ground of equity; provided the person receiving it has no reason, on natural right, implied donation, or compromise, to rely on the acquisition as his own (a). The action by which in the Roman law this was effected was called Condictio Indebiti, and the term has been adopted by us. It was an action founded, not on convention, but quasi ex contractu; a sort of pro-mutuum or quasi mutuum (b).

(a) 1 Stair, 7. § 9. 3 Ersk. 3. § 54. Pothier, Tr. de Cond. Indeb. § 160. Voet, lib. 12. tit. 6. § 7.

(b) 1 Stair, 11. § 5.

532. Special Rules.—The special rules on this subject are:—

(1.) Natural Obligation.—As restitution is grounded on equity, it has no place if the transference or payment have proceeded on a natural obligation; for that is binding in equity, as a bar, although it would not have grounded a demand at law (a).

(a) 3 Ersk. 3. § 54.

533. (2.) Knowledge of no Debt.—If the payment have been made with full knowledge of the person who makes it that he is under no debt or obligation to pay, it is held a donation, and irrevocable (a). 'So "aliment or entertainment given to any person without paction is presumed to be a donation, if the person is major and capable to make an agreement. But entertainment to minors (b) or weak persons doth ever infer recompense according to the true value of the benefit received" (c); unless they have estate of their own, or a father or guardians be accessible with whom a bargain might be made, or it appear from relationship or otherwise that the advances or aliment were gifted (d). In modern practice the tendency is to rely more on the evidence of facts and circumstances showing whether the aliment or advances were intended to be a donation (e).'

(a) 3 Ersk. 3. § 54. See as to Donations between Husband and Wife, below, § 1616.

(b) Rather, "pupils." See Elchies, Notes, 48. Drummond v. Swayne, 1834; 12 S. 342.

(c) 1 Stair, 8. § 2. 4 ib. 45. § 17 (15) and (17). See below, § 2192, as to relief to paupers.

(d) See 3 Ersk. 3 § 92. Drummond v. Swayne, cit.

(e) See, e.g., Forbes v. Forbes, 1869; 8 Macph. 85. M'Gaw's v. Galloway, 1882; 10 R. 157. The distinction in regard to repetition between gratuitous charity deliberately bestowed and mistaken fulfilment of an onerous obligation, is illustrated in Masters and Seamen of Dundee v. Cockerill, 1869; 8 Macph. 278, and cases there cited.

534. (3.) Error in Fact or Law.—If the payment have been made under an unavoidable error in fact 'affecting the payee's right to receive the money (a),' restitution may be demauded (b). 'It was formerly held that' if the person in error have in his own hands the means of correct knowledge, he cannot plead his error arising from gross negligence (c). 'But it is now settled that, however careless a person paying in error may have been, he may recover back what he has paid from one who had no right to receive it, provided only he has not intended to waive all inquiry and meant the payee to have the money at all events (d). The means of knowledge are material only as affording evidence of actual knowledge (e). Money paid under compulsion of legal process cannot be recovered back on the ground of error, because interest reipublice ut sit finis litium (f).'

If the error be in law, although sufficient to relieve from an obligation, it 'was' more doubtful whether it affords a good ground of restitution (g). In several cases the Court of Session held error in law to ground restitution (h); but this doctrine 'was, when the author wrote,' much shaken by a case in the House of Lords (i); 'and it rather seems that where there is bona fides, and money is paid with full knowledge of the facts, though there be no debt, it cannot be recovered back merely because paid in ignorance of law (k). But this rule is subject to the large exception that a party will be relieved against such a payment, if in the circumstances it be inequitable for the party receiving the money to profit by the mistake of the other (l).'

It is doubtful whether the rule, as stated above, is that which accords best with the natural development of our law; but the rule of the English common law was thrust upon us by Lord Brougham; and our judges have not yet had occasion to apply to it the modifications to which it is subject in England, in equity and even at common law. See Smith's L. C., and Addison, ll. cc.

535. (4.) Compromise.—If the payment have been made in the way of transaction or compromise, 'fairly entered into with full disclosure and good faith,' it is not revocable (a) 'on the ground of error, because the transaction is an independent obligation, and the Court will be slow to disturb the quiet which is the result of the agreement. To invalidate such a settlement or recover back a payment so made, mere mistake of law is not enough: it must be shown not merely that the payment was not originally due, but that the compromise was procured by unfair means (b).'

'(5.) Judgments.—On a like ground, the impossibility of carrying on the business of courts of law without some kind of finality, error in fact or law is no ground for restitution against a judgment. Error in fact, though produced by perjury, will not avail. In order to found a reduction, there must be error caused by fraud, as by subornation of perjury, or by deceit or corruption practised on judge or jury (c).'

536. (6.) Payment to True Creditor by Wrong Debtor.—In the Roman law there was no condictio, if the person who received the payment was really the creditor, and entitled to receive it, although the payment had been made by one erroneously supposing himself the debtor. This is not law with us; though perhaps in equity—where, in consequence of such negligent proceeding by him who pays, the creditor has been led into some expenditure which may bear hard upon him if obliged to refund; or where, in consideration of the payment, he has foregone some advantage, or given up a security, or liberated his debtor—he ought to be entitled to retain what he has got (a).

537. Periculum and Sale.—If restitution be demandable, not of money, but of a thing delivered and received unduly, the thing must be restored in the same condition in which it was received, barring accidents. If it have perished by the receiver's fault, or even without his fault if he have received it in mala fide, the value must be restored. If it have been sold in bonâ fide, the price must be paid over (a).

III. RECOMPENSE.

538. Where one has gained by the lawful act of another, done without any intention of donation, he is bound to recompense or indemnify that other to the extent of the gain (a). "The obligation of recompense is founded on the consideration that the party making the demand has been put to some expense or some disadvantage, and by reason of that expense or disadvantage there has been a benefit created to the party from whom he makes the demand, of such a kind that it cannot be undone. . . . In every case there must be, in order to ground the claim, the loss to one party resulting in a benefit to the other" (b).'

A prominent example of the doctrine occurs where one in bonâ fide builds on another's ground 'believing it to be his own.' Although the property of the building passes as an accessory to the owner of the ground, he is liable in recompense to the extent of what he has thus acquired (c). 'The recompense due in such cases is measured by the enhanced permanent value of the subjects at the time when the true owner resumes possession, arising (apart from any natural increment of value (d)) from improvements executed during the subsistence of bonâ fide possession (e); but it cannot exceed the sum originally expended (f).' But in this matter the doctrine of Lord Stair seems to be carried too far, in giving the benefit of this law of recompense to one who in mala fide builds on another's ground (g). The case between a liferenter and fiar is peculiar when the rebuilding of a ruined or burnt tenement is in question (h).

Meliorations.—Those whose right is merely temporary are presumed to make improvements or additions only for their own convenience, and so, 'except as the rule is modified on equitable grounds by custom or the peculiar character of the possession (i), or by the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act (k),' have no claim of recompense (l). So it is when a tenant builds for his own accommodation (m). 'It was laid down in previous editions, that' when a right is prematurely terminated, there seems to be room for a claim of recompense; as when a tenant becomes bankrupt after having erected valuable buildings on his farm (n). 'But this must depend on the nature of the right and the circumstances attending it; and it has been formally decided that the doctrine does not apply when a lease is prematurely determined by the tenant's death or other cause, as the possibility of such a termination must have been contemplated by the parties (o).' So, on the reduction of conveyances, under which the purchasers have in bonâ fide made meliorations, the principle of recompense applies; though there seems to be a distinction between simple fiars and heirs of entail as to right to resort to the land in security (p). But one who is only a creditor holding a security over the subject meliorated, is not liable for recompense, or for the cost of meliorations made by order of the proprietor (q).

Rhodia de Jactu, due quasi ex contractu to those who suffer by loss of goods, etc., sacrificed at sea for the common safety (r).

These cases afford authority for the wide rule stated; and show that the right to recompense has place in various relations not specifically noticed in this paragraph. But cases of so-called recompense are often very like claims on quasi-contracts, e.g. actio contraria negotiorum gestorum; and subject to the general principles laid down here there is a tendency to decide each case on its own circumstances. 539. Remuneration for Services.—Where one has been lawfully employed in services relative to a common subject, he has a right to recompense, in respect of the benefit derived from those services by any one taking advantage of them (a). So employment in an office requiring skill and attendance is to be recompensed, although at entering on the employment nothing was said as to salary (b). But this does not hold as to a political agent (c); nor as to a partner employed in extraordinary labour for the company (d).

IV. NEGOTIORUM GESTIO.

540. Nature of it.—Negotiorum Gestio is the management of the affairs of one who is absent, 'or incapacitated from attending to his affairs (a),' spontaneously undertaken without his knowledge, and on the presumption that he would, if aware of the circumstances, have given a mandate for such interference. An obligation is hence raised by legal construction, to the effect of indemnifying the negotiorum gestor (b).

541. Rules.—The rules of this obligation are, that the negotiorum gestor is bound to complete the performance of the act which he has begun, as if he held a proper mandate, unless the principal shall relieve him; to account for his intromissions, and restore all that he has received; and to bestow a degree of care and diligence, altering with circumstances,—subjecting him for culpa levissima, if his interference be officious, exclusive, and interested; for culpa levis only, if he have interfered in the fair course of friendly intercourse, without very strong necessity; and for no more than culpa lata, in cases of necessary interference or sudden emergency (a). On the other hand, the person for whom the negotiorum gestor interferes is bound to indemnify him for expenditure, necessarily, or usefully, or even reasonably and in bonâ fide, laid out (b); and to relieve him from all engagements undertaken for his benefit in the course of his interference.

		(5.) Carelessness of Public Officers.
		554. (6.) Responsibility of Master for Servant.

543. General Rule.—The rights of individuals, either to property or to personal liberty, safety, or reputation, are not only protected by penal law, but in civil law they furnish, when invaded, ground of action for reparation. This class of civil remedies has by lawyers been divided into actions grounded on delict, and actions grounded on something short of delict, but which, to the purposes of civil reparation, is so considered—quasi delict. The remedies for injury to the person will be discussed hereafter (a). Here it is sufficient to state the general principles of the obligation to repair damage.

(a) See § 2028 et seq.

544. Delict.—(1.) Nature of it.—A delict is an offence committed with an injurious, fraudulent, or criminal purpose. Criminal law looks to the prevention of delict by punishment, example, and terror, without any view to indemnification; while civil jurisprudence, looking only to indemnification, without regard to punishment or example, raises for this purpose, by construction of law, an obligation to repair the damage occasioned by the delict (a).

(a) 3 Ersk. 1. § 13. Duff v. Bradberry, 1825; 4 S. 23; 1 Ill. 329. Clark v. Thomson, 1816; 1 Mur. 161. Gordon v. Royal Bank, 1826; 5 S. 164.

545. (2.) Distinction between Damages for Breach of Contract and Delict.—There is this difference between the responsibility for damage arising from breach of contract, and the liability for damage occasioned by delict, that the former gives reparation of direct damage only (a); the latter, the highest advantage which, but for the delict, would have been enjoyed. 'But in the latter case, also, the wrong-doer is properly liable only for such loss as is the natural and probable consequence of his own acts; and although all damages which, under ordinary circumstances, might be expected to result from the wrongful act are recoverable, those which are too remote will be excluded (b). It has not been unusual to take the wrong-doer's motives (e.g. malice) into account in assessing damages for delicts and quasi delicts (c); but it may perhaps be held that this is done in England mainly because the law of that country does not, as ours does, admit of a pecuniary payment as solatium for wounded feelings. It is clear that damages for injuries to property may generally be ascertained as precisely as damages for breach of contract, and are so dealt with in both countries; while in other cases of delict (and even actions for breach of contract which partake of the character of delict, e.g. some cases of personal injury), the estimation of solatium, or of compensation for bodily suffering, cannot be readily limited by rules, or made a mere matter of calculation. All that can be said in such cases is, that, subject to the general rules above indicated, and to the caution or reservation that it is frequently if not always impossible and unfair to attempt to give an absolutely perfect pecuniary compensation (d), damages are to be such compensation as, under all the circumstances, is fair and reasonable (e). Damages are given although it may be impossible to say that the person claiming is out of pocket in any definite sum, as where a harbour authority is deprived by a collision of the use of a dredging machine (f).

'(3.) Motive—Malice.—It seems a truism to say that reparation can be recovered only for the commission of a wrongful, i.e. of an illegal, act. Yet it is only lately decided, after some difference of opinion, that an action in itself lawful does not become unlawful, so as to make the doer liable to an action for damages, because it is done with an evil or malicious motive. Thus a man may exercise his right of diverting subterranean water within his own ground so as to deprive his neighbour of it, although he does so from malicious motives and not in the pursuit of his own interests alone (g). And one may "procure" the dismissal of a servant or workman, if he employs no unlawful means, and if the dismissal does not involve the breach of an existing contract (h). The rule is, in short, that malice in legal questions depends, not on the motive of the actor, but on the illegal nature of the act which he contemplates and commits (i).'

(c) See above, § 32. Mayne on Dam. 23. Cases in § 546 (a). It has been held that as the degree of a defender's fault is an element in assessing the damages, evidence of the manner in which an accident has happened, or an injury been inflicted, is not to be excluded by an admission of liability. (i) Per Lord Watson, in Allen v. Flood, p. 94.

546. (4.) Action and Title.—The civil action for reparation grounded on delict is not, like the penal action in criminal law, confined to the delinquent. The wrong-doer's representative is liable for reparation 'so far as he has assets (in quantum lucratus est)'; in which we follow the rule of the canon rather than of the civil law (a). 'It has sometimes been thought that, when a claim for damages and solatium on account of personal injury arises, it vests ipso facto and ipso jure by the commission of the injury, and being a debt passes to the legal representatives of the sufferer. It has now been decided that, unless there has been patrimonial loss, i.e. direct injury to the estate passing to the executor, no action is competent to him (b). On the other hand, if the injured person has raised action against the delinquent, the usual effect of litiscontestatio follows, and on the pursuer's death his executor may insist in the action (c). The law on this point has been of late development, because of the practice of our Courts to allow action by certain relatives of deceased persons against those who wrongfully or negligently caused the death, not in a representative capacity, but in their own right. This right is limited to the lawful (d) children or parents, husband or wife, of the deceased (e).

'When one has received reparation, or has brought an action to judgment, for a delict, he cannot again sue on the ground of a subsequent increase or development of the damages. The prospective damages ought to be assessed once for all, for "nemo debet bis vexari pro una et eadem causa" (f). On the same principle, the executor or relatives of one who has raised an action of damages for personal injury, and afterwards dies in consequence of the injury, cannot raise a separate action for his own loss by the pursuer's death (g). Different relatives cannot raise simultaneous or concurrent actions, and a married woman cannot sue for the death of a child, her husband being the proper pursuer (h).

'When two persons have been injured by the same wrong, they may insist for damages in the same action, the summons applying the claim to the pursuers separately, and asking separate sums of damages (i).'

In England there is no claim of damages for the death of a relative by fault or negligence, except under statute. 9 and 10 Vict. c. 93 (Lord Campbell's Act); 27 and 28 Vict. c. 95. See Addison, Torts, 608.

The right to sue a second action for a continuing nuisance, and to sue on a subsequent subsidence of land due to the same mining operation, are hardly exceptions to the rule. See below, § 965.

547. (5.) Responsibility of Master for Delict 'or Quasi Delict' of Servant.—Distinctions are necessary as to the responsibility of a master, or of one having authority, for the delicts of servants. If a master give express directions, in obeying which damage is done, he is liable for it. Where something is directed to be done, or is in the common line of the servant's duty, but no special directions are given, the servant's act, and even his exercise of discretion, is the act and discretion of the master, and he is liable (a). Where the master has not ordered or authorised the thing to be done, and especially where he has forbidden it, he is not liable; 'but so long as the servant is acting within the general scope of his employment, a prohibition as to the manner or place of doing an act within that employment does not relieve the master from liability for the servant's negligence (b).' And if the servant wilfully or maliciously do an injurious act, 'for his own private ends, and so as in doing it to divest himself of the character of servant,' his master will not be liable (c). 'And as no master is presumed to authorise his servant to do an illegal act, he will not be liable for a crime or fraud committed by his servant, though in the course of his business, unless with his knowledge his business be benefited by it (d). A person is not liable for the negligent acts of a tradesman or independent contractor employed by him, committed during the course of the work (e).'

B. 501; 39 L. J. Q. B. 291. Rourke v. White Moss Coll. Co., 2 C. P. D. 205).

547A. (6.) 'Fault of Master or of Fellow-Servants.—It is a rule of law that the master who employs a servant (not an agent) is responsible to persons outside his business for the fault or negligence of that servant in matters in which he is employed, and this rule is expressed in the maxim Qui facit per alium facit per se. But a series of decisions has settled this exception, that a master or employer is not so liable to a fellow-servant, because the fellow-servant in entering the employment contemplates and undertakes the natural and ordinary risks of the employment, and one of these risks is the possible negligence of a fellow-servant who has been selected with due care by the employer (a). A foreman, or manager (b), or the master of a ship, appointed by the employer (c), is a fellow-servant with the workmen or seamen under him, in the sense of the rule; although the Scotch Courts, until overruled, distinguished where the fault was that of such a superior servant, or "deputy master" "representing" the master (d).

'The defence of common employment is available only when the defender (i.e. the person sought to be made liable for the fault of his servant) can show that the pursuer was in his service. The exemption depends on the relations between the three parties, and there is no room for it where there is no legal relation of which the workman's undertaking can be an implied term. Hence certain cases have been overruled in which the servants of independent contractors working towards the same end, such as the building of a house, were held to be fellow-servants with each other and with the servants of the employer, in a common employment (e).

'On the other hand, as the exemption rests on an implied contract to take the risk of negligence of those employed by the same employer in the same work or undertaking, it is not limited to the case where the injured party is able to see and calculate the hazards to which he is exposed. All persons employed under the same employer for the purposes of the same business, however different their duties and although the departments in which they are engaged are quite distinct, are within the meaning of the rule, so that, e.g., porters at a railway station are fellow-workmen with the company's platelayers making repairs on the line, or carpenters working on the roof of an engine-shed (f). But it follows from the terms in which the principle is stated that an employer who carries on businesses quite distinct in character or in locality or in both, may not be exempt from liability for the fault of a servant in one concern, by which one of his servants in another has been injured; for example, if a man is both a banker and a brewer, and his bank clerk is run over by his drayman. In such a case there is not a common employment for the same general purpose. It has been held that the seamen in two ships belonging to the same owner, which come into collision at sea or in a river, are not in a common employment in the sense of the rule (g).

'A master is still liable in reparation to a servant if he has personally failed to use reasonable care in carrying on the work, in furnishing the machinery or material used, in keeping the machinery in proper repair, in selecting his managers and other servants or in organising the work (defective system) (h).

'A master is not answerable, except under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, for injuries to which the servant has contributed by his own fault (see § 2031), or which the servant was equally able with his employer to foresee and guard against, or which occur without fault in a necessarily dangerous employment which the servant has undertaken with full knowledge of all the risks (i). But when an accident occurs by breakdown of plant or machinery, a defect may often be inferred from the circumstances; and when this is so, and when it is proved that the defect could have been discovered by proper inspection (k), the employer has to discharge the onus of showing that it occurred without his fault (l).

'Volenti non fit injuria.—The doctrine of common employment may almost be regarded as a development of the principle expressed by the maxim Volenti non fit injuria, which has a wider application and is not confined to questions between masters and servants. The maxim would require distinct and separate notice, if space permitted. But here, as in the whole subject of reparation of injuries, it is impossible to deal with details, and it is undesirable to classify the multitude of cases reported with no apparent utility. In questions between employer and employed, the maxim imports that the latter expressly or by implication agreed to take upon himself the risks attending the particular work which he was engaged to do, and in doing which he has been injured. The mere fact of his knowing the danger and continuing at his work does not always infer his acceptance of the risk; and the question whether he has done so is one of fact and not of law (m).'

547B. (7.) 'Employers' Liability Act, 1880.

—The House of Lords having carried the doctrine stated in the previous section beyond reason, the rule which the Scotch Courts had previously adopted (a) was, subject to several limitations, restored by statute from 1st January 1881 (b); viz. that an employer is answerable to his servants for the negligence of those to whom he delegates his authority.

'By this Act a workman (i.e. any railway servant, and any one to whom the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, applies (c)), "or in case the injury results in death, his legal personal representatives and any persons entitled in case of death" (d), have, in the enumerated cases, the same right of compensation and remedies against the employer as if the workman had not been in the service of the employer or engaged in his work (e), unless he knew of the defect or negligence which caused the injury and failed to give information of it to his employer or some one in authority, or was aware that the employer or such person already knew of such defect or negligence (f); or unless he have contracted not to claim under the Act (g). The defence of contributory negligence, and also that founded on the maxim Volenti non fit injuria (known danger), are not taken away by the Act (h). But the latter cannot be pleaded where the injury arises from the employer's breach of a statutory regulation (i). The cases in which this right is given are: Where personal injury is caused to a workman

'(1.) "By reason of any defect in the condition of the ways, works, machinery, or plant connected with or used in the business of the employer" (k), provided always that "the defect arose from, or had not been discovered or remedied owing to the negligence of the employer, or of some person in the service of the employer, and entrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the ways, works, machinery, or plant were in proper condition" (l).

'(2.) "By reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer who has any superintendence entrusted to him, whilst in the exercise of such superintendence"; such person being defined as "a person whose sole or principal duty is that of superintendence, and who is not ordinarily engaged in manual labour" (m).

'(3.) "By reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer to whose orders or directions the workman at the time of the injury was bound to conform, and did conform, where such injury resulted from his having so conformed" (n).

'(4.) "By reason of the act or omission of any person in the service of the employer, done or made in obedience to the rules or bye-laws of the employer, or in obedience to particular instructions given by any person delegated with the authority of the employer in that behalf" (o), provided always that the injury resulted from some impropriety or defect in such rules, bye-laws, or instructions, not being a rule or bye-law approved or accepted by a department of Government under or by virtue of any Act of Parliament (p).

'(5.) "By reason of the negligence of any person in the service of the employer who has the charge or control of any signal, points, locomotive engine, or train upon a railway" (q).

'In order to give a right of action under the Act, notice of the injury, stating the name and address of the person injured, and the cause and date of the injury, must be given in the way specified within six weeks, and the action must be commenced within six months, or in case of death within twelve months, from the occurrence of the accident (r). The amount recoverable is limited to the estimated earnings, for three years preceding the injury, of a person in like employment in the district (s); and the action must be brought in the Sheriff Court, though it may be removed to the Court of Session for jury trial (t).'

If the injury is attributable to the serious and wilful misconduct (which is not mere "contributory fault") of the workman, any compensation claimed is disallowed. Special machinery is provided for working the provisions of this remarkable statute, which is only saved from being revolutionary and tyrannical by the possibility under the conditions of modern life of insuring (a).'

(a) 61 and 62 Vict. c. 37. A. of S., June 3, 1898.

548. (9.) Effect of a Penalty.—The imposition of a penalty by statute is no discharge of the civil claim for reparation, 'at least if it exist independently of the statute, or if the statute imposes a duty which has not been fulfilled' (a).

(a) 3 Ersk. 1. § 14. See above, § 36; and cases there in note (c) in fine.

549. (10.) Effect of Impracticability of Restoration.—Where exact restoration is impracticable, damages are due, to be ascertained by the verdict of a jury.

550. (11.) Joint and Several Liability.—Although in criminal law each party is liable only to his own punishment, in civil reparation, the partners or associates in a crime perpetrated by united counsels and means, are liable singuli in solidum, unless the acts are distinct (a). 'The rule is extended to claims arising from quasi delicts; although it is thought to be contrary to principle and inconvenient in its application to acts or omissions which are not tainted with fraud or moral delinquency (b). Under this rule it has been held that a discharge granted to one wrong-doer for a partial payment or satisfaction, not being a renunciation of the whole claim, does not liberate the others (c); and in England that judgment against one of several joint delinquents, though unsatisfied, is a bar, for reasons of public policy, to an action against the others (d).

'Relief among Wrong-doers.—There is no contribution or relief among wrong-doers (e). It has, however, been decided that in Scotland one who has paid damages to the person injured under a joint and several decree is not precluded from obtaining relief against his co-debtors, for in doing so he founds only on the decree, and does not need to go behind it or found on the joint wrong (f). The rule applies alike whether the wrong is a delict or a quasi delict, a crime or merely a negligent omission. But weighty opinions distinguish in favour of the case of those whose liability has not arisen from conscious and therefore moral wrong, and who are not to be disabled from recovering against co-delinquents; and that whether it has been brought to judgment or not (g).'

553. Quasi Delict.—(1.) Nature of it.—Gross negligence or imprudence, though it should bear no such character of fraud, malice, or criminal purpose as to subject the person to criminal cognisance, is, as a ground for an action for damages, held as a delict, to the effect of making the person guilty of the imprudence or negligence liable to indemnify the person who suffers by the fault. These are by lawyers called quasi delicts (a).

Injury 'by which the author here means "harm" or damage' to the property of another (even where it appears that extraordinary vigilance and skill might have prevented loss) will not ground an action of damages: 'that is to say, there is often damnum sine injuria, and damages will be given only when there is a legal wrong, an invasion of another's right; in other words, a breach of duty (b). The duties which have to be considered in questions of this kind are infinitely various, and the most general statement of those which do not arise out of contract, have not the sanction of the criminal law, and breaches of which are described as quasi delicts or negligence, is that they arise from the possession of property or from the relations of life (§ 2026 sqq.), or are imposed by statute. It is a quasi delict or negligence when a man unintentionally, i.e. without malice or fraud, but from want of care, interferes with the rights of another so as to cause him to suffer loss. So (c)'—

(2.) 'Collision of Ships.'—If negligence or want of competent skill be shown, as in cases of collision of ships (d); as to which the rules are 'now contained in "Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea," enacted under the Act of 1894 by the Queen's Order in Council of 27th November 1896 (e). The rules of maritime law in regard to damages in cases of collision were thus stated by Lord Stowell': (1) that where no blame is imputable to either party, but the damage is by storm 'or other vis major or inevitable accident (f),' the loss falls where it lights, and neither is liable to the other; (2) that where both are to blame for want of the requisite vigilance or skill, the loss is apportioned between them (g); (3) that if the suffering party alone has been to blame, he must bear the burden; and (4) that if the fault is with the vessel which has run down and injured the other, the latter will be entitled to an entire compensation (h). 'If it is proved in case of collision that any of the regulations for preventing collisions contained in or made under any of the Merchant Shipping Acts from 1854 to 1894 has been infringed, the ship infringing (i) it is to be deemed in fault, unless the circumstances have made a departure from the regulations necessary (k).'

(3.) Keeping dangerous Dogs, etc.—Carelessness in the keeping of a dangerous dog 'or other animal,' or in the management of fire-arms, subjects to damages in reparation (l). 'It was formerly held that the owner's knowledge of the dangerous or mischievous character of a domesticated animal must in all cases be proved in order to render him liable (m); but now, in any action for injury to sheep or cattle, it is not necessary to prove a previous propensity in a dog to injure sheep or cattle; and the occupier of the place where the dog is kept or allowed to stay is liable, unless he proves that he is not the owner, and that it was kept or allowed to remain on the premises without his sanction or knowledge (n). Cattle includes horses (o). There is little doubt that carelessness, as above stated, is still the ground of liability; and will be readily inferred if a dog is allowed to stray from home and worries sheep or cattle (p). The "scienter," i.e. the owner's or custodier's knowledge of the animal's vicious propensity, must still be proved in the case of other domesticated animals, and in the case of injuries done by dogs to persons or other animals than sheep or cattle (q). And one who keeps a dog or bull, or the like, which he knows to be of a ferocious disposition, or a wild beast, is not merely bound to take all proper precautions for its control, but, at all events in a question with one who is lawfully on the ground and is not himself in fault, is absolutely bound to prevent mischief, and must at his peril keep the animal from doing hurt. In other words, in such a case it is unnecessary for the injured person to adduce evidence of substantive negligence (r). A distinction has been taken between the effect of scientia in a question between the owner and one of the public, and in one between the owner and a servant employed

The recording of a protest on a bill is a judicial proceeding, and falls under class (a). Gardiner v. Martin, 1864; 2 Macph. 1183. But it is unnecessary to aver malice and want of probable cause in claiming damages for recording a protest and charging thereon when the bill had been paid before it was protested, for a charge is diligence falling under class (b). Gibb v. Edin. Brewery Co., 1873; 11 Macph. 705. This appears to rest on the principle, which applies to every case of diligence, that when the debt is paid there is no longer any valid warrant. PART III

OF EXTINCTION OF OBLIGATIONS

INTRODUCTION

555. Obligations are extinguished, either —1. By actual fulfilment of the engagement, payment, performance, or satisfaction made to the creditor; or, 2. By virtual fulfilment, compensation, novation, or confusion; or, 3. By discharge on the part of the creditor; or, 4. By presumed abandonment or satisfaction.

CHAPTER XIX

OF PAYMENT AND PERFORMANCE

I. PAYMENT.

556. General Rule.

557-559. By whom Payment may be made.

560. To whom it may be made.
561-562. Bond Fide Payment.
563. Indefinite Payments.
564. Evidence of Payment.
564-565. (1.) General Rule.

566-568. (2.) Presumed Payment.

II. PERFORMANCE.

I. PAYMENT.

556. General Rule.—Payment or prestation by the true debtor in the obligation to the true creditor, satisfies and extinguishes the engagement (a). But the creditor is not bound to accept of a partial payment, or of anything but proper payment according to the obligation (b).

(a) 1 Stair, 18. § 3. 3 Ersk. 4. § 1-6. Kilkerran, 284.
(b) 3 Ersk. 4. § 1.

557. By whom Payment may be made.—Payment, to the effect of extinguishing the obligation, may be made not only by the debtor himself, but by any one acting for the debtor: or even by a stranger, where the debt is pecuniary, and due, and demanded (a); or where any penal effect may arise from delay; or where the creditor has no interest in demanding performance by the proper debtor. The debtor cannot prevent any stranger from paying and demanding an assignation if the creditor chooses to grant it. But the creditor cannot be compelled to grant an assignation, unless the debtor shall consent, and the granting of the assignation shall not interfere with any other interest of the creditor himself (b).

‘If he be pressing his debtor by diligence, he is bound at his request to assign the debt to any friend who interposes to pay the debt for him, provided he have no good reason for refusing. But the right to an assignation is founded in equity, and the right to demand or to refuse must alike be supported by a reasonable interest (c).’

(c) Fleming and Will, citt. 3 Ersk. 5. § 11. Sligo v. Menzies, 1840; 2 D. 1478.

558. Payment made by one interested in the debt (as co-obligant or surety) will take away the right of the creditor, but will not extinguish the debt of the principal obligant. The person so paying is entitled to an assignation, to the effect of operating his relief (a).

(a) See Guthrie v. Smith & M'Connachy, citt.; and below, § 910A.

559. Payment is presumed to have been made by the proper debtor where the evidence is ambiguous, even in the case of bills and promissory notes (a).

Payment made by one administering for the debtor in any representative capacity, as tutor, trustee, factor, etc., is presumed to be made from the funds of the principal, and so to extinguish the debt; otherwise it is negotiorum gestio (b).

560. To whom Payment may be made.—Payment will extinguish the debt in the following cases:—If made to the true creditor, or to his heir with his title completed, provided they shall be in full capacity to discharge the debt (a); or if made to one duly authorised by the creditor to receive it, as assignee, trustee, factor, etc. (b). But a wife has no such power (c); neither has a messenger or officer of the law employed to do diligence for the debt; so that payment to him is no extinction of the debt, unless, as is sometimes the case, such messenger is employed as agent (d). 'In general, payment to an agent who has authority to take payment must be in cash, and not by a mere settlement of accounts.'

561. Bonâ fide Payment.—Payment is good if made in bonâ fide to one to whom the debtor has been led or allowed by the creditor to believe in point of fact (a) that he has given authority to receive it (b); as to the original creditor after assignation or diligence not duly intimated (c); or after 'sequestration in' bankruptcy unknown to the debtor (d); or by tenants to a landlord after a sale of the estate; or by tenants after the landlord has granted an heritable bond, if either it has not been intimated (e), or, though intimated, if the creditor has not taken possession or demanded the rents; or, though he has taken decree of maills and duties, if he has allowed it to remain for a long time without a charge or claim against the tenant (f). Payment made in bonâ fide to the creditor after arrestment of the funds of one abroad is good, if there has not been personal notice given to the debtor (g); and it has been held that even a payment made by a debtor at a distance from home, after arrestment used at his dwelling-house, was good (h). Payment to one who had been factor, without notice of recall of the factory, is good (i): so also, if made to one possessed of the documents of debt, with apparently a good title to receive payment (k); or to one by acquiescence allowed to receive rents for an apparent heir (l).

(k) But mere possession of the document of debt by a factor for trustees for the purpose of uplifting interest was held not to presume authority to uplift principal. Duncan v. Clyde Trs., supra, § 560 (b). See Addison on Contracts, 143.

562. But to prevent collusion between tenants and landlords to the prejudice of singular successors, a tenant's payment of rent before the legal term is not a bonâ fide payment to save him from the demand of a creditor or purchaser (a). This, however, does not prevent a payment after the legal and before the conventional term (b). Nor does it apply to the payment of a debt before the time of payment (c). It holds respecting the payment of feu-duties, and it would seem also to hold as to the interest of heritable debts. 'The presumption of collusion does not operate in favour of the trustee on the landlord's sequestrated estate, who takes the estate tantum et tale (d), and it seems reasonable to hold that the rule may be set aside by evidence of good faith on the part of the tenant (e).'

563. Indefinite Payments.—Where several debts are due, the debtor may, in making the payment (a), appropriate it to a particular debt, under this limitation, that the creditor cannot be compelled to take a partial payment. If there be no distinct appropriation by the debtor, the creditor may by his receipt appropriate it (b). If there be no appropriation by either of the parties, the creditor may, 'at the time or afterwards, before action (c),' ascribe it to which debt he pleases: to interest, for example, and not to the principal debt (d); or to the worst secured debt; or to a debt bearing no interest instead of one on which interest runs; or to a debt in danger of prescribing, leaving a more recent one unpaid (e). It has even been held that he was not bound to apply it to a debt which he was employed to recover (f). But this is to be received under the equitable limitation, that the debtor shall not, by such appropriation of the creditor, be left exposed to penal consequences; nor have the payment ascribed to a disputed debt, 'or one for which the debtor is liable only in a representative character (g), or to a part of the debt which is illegal (h)'; nor a cautioner 'wholly (i)' deprived of the benefit of the payment where the debtor is insolvent; nor a payment, as understood at the time of payment, ascribed differently on emerging circumstances (k); nor a dividend from a sequestrated estate applied otherways than to the whole debt (l). 'When no appropriation has been made by either party, and especially, e.g., in the case of an account current between the parties, such as a banking account, the law appropriates payments to the various debts in their order: it presumes, for instance, where there is a running account, that the parties intended to apply the first item on the credit side to discharge the first item on the debit side, and so on (m). But this rule suffers exception, when a particular mode of dealing, or express arrangement, shows a different intention of the parties (n).'

(a) Specific appropriation of money or debts receives effect in several cases, as here, in compensation (§ 574), and retention (§ 1414); but a mere obligation to appropriate a fund in a particular way cannot create a security or ius in re. An obligation to pay a debt out of certain profits has no more effect than an obligation to pay. Graham & Co. v. Raeburn & Verel, 1895; 23 K. 84. Infra, § 1333.

564. Evidence of Payment. — (1.) The General Rule is: "unumquodque eodem modo solvitur quo colligatur."

565. So payment of an obligation constituted by writing must be proved by written evidence, as in a money debt. But parole evidence is sufficient where the contract is parole, and payment an integral part of it, as in sale for ready money (a). 'So, when payment forms part of a series of intromissions or agency transactions, where payment is made by third parties on behalf of the debtor, parole has sometimes been admitted (b). A receipt neither holograph nor tested, the signature being proved, is generally, and always in payment of rents and in re mercatorid, sufficient evidence of payment (c). Payment of bills and notes may, it appears, be proved by parole (d).'

566. (2.) Presumed Payment.—Payment is not in general to be presumed, unless the circumstances are irreconcilable with the subsistence of the debt (a). But it is presumed from the document 'of debt' being found in possession of the debtor 'or cautioner,' according to the maxim, Chirographum apud debitorem repertum præsuntitur solutum (b). This presumption, however, yields to proof, 'which may be by parole (c)'; as in a bill sent for acceptance, and kept by the drawee; or a receipt or document lost, and falling into the debtor's hands; or a bill stolen from a messenger (d). 'When a cheque is proved or admitted to have been granted by a debtor to his creditor and paid, the presumption is, in the absence of contrary evidence, that it was a payment to account of the debt (e).'

567. From three consecutive discharges of periodical payments (as rents, interests, feu-duties, or salaries), payment of all preceding is presumed 'apocha trium annorum' (a); and it appears that the presumption may be re-dargued by parole (b). But it is not enough that there have been three consecutive payments without a discharge (c). 'Nor does the presumption arise where arrears are constituted by bill or bond, although there are consecutive discharges for the following terms (d).' It was doubted whether the presumption holds where the discharges are by a factor (e); but such discharge has been held sufficient. One discharge for three consecutive years does not raise the presumption; nor is it enough to show irregular payments amounting in all to three years' rent or interest (f).

'Silence — Mora. — Payment is presumed from taciturnity, i.e. where the relation of the parties and the whole circumstances, coupled with long silence (but not silence or failure to make a demand alone), lead to the reasonable inference of payment or abandonment (g). In claims which require constitution, mere delay (mora) is enough to found a plea of abandonment or waiver, at least when it is such that it may have caused the party against whom the claim is made to have altered his position or lost evidence (h).'

Nor will it hold if local custom be different, 'as it now generally is, unless in the case of those who are merely consulting physicians or surgeons (d). well as the constitution of the debt, which he may do prout de jure (e).'

II. PERFORMANCE.

569. Rules.—Obligations ad factum præstandum may be implemented by any one representing the debtor, or by his authority, or by one interposing for his relief from the obligation; provided in those several cases the creditor have no interest to insist on the debtor himself fulfilling his obligation.

571. When the obligation relates to a specific subject, the destruction of the subject, without fault, extinguishes the obligation; if the subject be destroyed by fault of the obligor, the obligation resolves into a claim of damage (a).

CHAPTER XX

OF COMPENSATION

572. Nature of Compensation.
573. General Rules.

574. Exceptions.
575. Operation.

572. Nature of Compensation.—The concurrence of two liquid debts reciprocally due may be made to operate as payment from the moment of concurrence (a). This is called in England “Set-off”; with us, “Compensation.” It rests on two principles—the expediency of abating lawsuits, and the avoiding of injustice; and this doctrine is in Scotland established and regulated by statute.

(a) 1592, c. 141. 1 Stair, 18. § 6. Moore’s Notes, p. cxxxviii. 3 Ersk. Prin. 4. § 2. 3 Ersk. 4. § 11–19. 2 Bell’s Com. 124. In England the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, 23 and 24 Vict. c. 126, which gave an extended right of set-off to defendants, have been still further enlarged by the “Supreme Court Judicature Acts, 1873–1894,” and the rules made under them. In particular, counter-claims for damages may be set up; and a defendant pleading a set-off may obtain all such relief as he has properly claimed by his pleading, and as the Court might have granted in an action instituted for the same purpose. In Scotland the reform of procedure has not extended so far in this direction.

573. The General Rules of compensation are—

(1.) The debts must be of the same nature. So, an obligation to deliver grain or goods cannot be set off against a pecuniary obligation (a); but a claim for damage sustained in the carriage of goods has been allowed to be set off against freight (b). ‘This, however, is not properly compensation under the statute 1592, c. 141; but rests on the ground that a party who has failed to fulfil his part of a mutual contract is not entitled to insist on performance of the counterpart (c).’

(2.) The debts must both be due: So there is no compensation between a present debt, and one that is future or contingent (d).

(3.) The debts must both be liquid, “certum an et quantum debeatur” (e); it being, however, sufficient that the debt shall be instantly verified by writ or oath (f). But the bankruptcy of one of the parties seems to entitle the other in equity to retain (g) till the illiquid debt be constituted, or in security of a future ‘or contingent’ debt: ‘So an indorser of a bill cannot plead compensation against a claim by the acceptor while his indorsee holds the bill; but he is entitled to retain what he owes to the acceptor, the debtor in the bill, until he is relieved of his contingent liability, and when he pays and again becomes holder of the bill he has a proper right of compensation (h).’

(4.) The parties must be debtor and creditor, each in his own right, and at the same time (i). A factor will, to this effect, be held as principal where he has sold goods consigned to him without notice to the buyer of his being only a factor (k); but if, before the goods are delivered, the purchaser has notice that they belong to a third party, there will be no compensation on a debt of the factor (l). And when the sale is by a broker without disclosing the name of his principal, the buyer cannot plead compensation on a debt due by him to the broker (m). ‘The rule is, that if a principal by his conduct induces a buyer to believe that his agent is contracting on his own account, he is subject to all the equities pleadable by a party contracting with the agent which have arisen before the principal is disclosed; e.g. to compensation upon a debt existing before such disclosure, though it may not have existed at the time of the contract (n). Compensation cannot be pleaded if the party contracting knows that the other party is an agent, though he may not know who the principal is (o). A factor entrusted with the possession of goods is presumed to have authority to sell in his own name, and a purchaser's right to a set-off against him is not defeated by a private prohibition by his principal to sell in his own name (p). It would seem that when an agent sues for the price of goods sold by him as his own, or for a debt due to his principal, having himself no beneficial interest in the claim, the buyer or debtor may plead compensation on a debt due to him by the principal (q). On this principle an executor or trustee, dealing as such with a bank, is not exposed to a plea of compensation or retention upon a debt due to the bank by the testator (r).'

(5.) Difficult questions have arisen as to compensation between company debts and debts of the partners. The rules seem to be these: In the common case there is no concurrence of debt and credit between the debt of the company and the debt of any individual partner; the company forming an entirely separate person in law (s). But it 'is now settled that' a company, called upon to pay a debt to one who is debtor of a partner, may arrange with that partner to enable them to satisfy the debt by assigning his debt to the company, so as to make a concurrence (t). Such arrangement, however, cannot be made after bankruptcy (u). Where the company debt is demanded from a partner, or where the company is bankrupt or dissolved, the partner may set off the debt due to him against the company debt (v). 'After the dissolution of a solvent company, each partner has a right to a share of the debts due to the firm; and hence there is then a proper concursus debiti et crediti between a debt due by a partner and a debt due to the company by his creditor in that debt, to the extent of his share (w).'

(6.) If any one has an interest in extinguishing the debt claimed, he may plead compensation (x).

574. The Exceptions to these Rules are—that there is no compensation in deposit (a). Specific appropriation bars compensation; as in the case of an obligation by the debtor to pay certain debts; or where money is given for the purpose of retiring a bill; or when a bill is given to the banker for discount, or sent for payment (b); 'or where the debtor's obligation is expressly alimentary or for the maintenance of the creditor (c).' A debt prescribed cannot compensate a debt not prescribed, unless upon a reference to oath in the short prescriptions (d); and a debt acquired after bankruptcy, or after diligence to attach the debt claimed, is not a sufficient ground of compensation (e). 'The fact that a party has a cautioner or collateral security for his debt is not destructive of a right of compensation (f).'

(f) Hannay & Son's Tr. v. Armstrong & Co., 1875; 2 R. 399; aff. 1877, 4 R. H. L. 43.

575. Operation.—Compensation operates according to these rules:—It must be pleaded 'and sustained' (a), not having with us (as it had by the Roman law) any effect ipso jure; so it does not stop prescription (b) 'till pleaded (c).' And it must be pleaded before decree; not being competent by suspension after judgment pronounced (d). Even where the decree is in absence, the general rule holds (e); but it has been sometimes relaxed (f). It is, however, competent to be stated by suspension against a decree of registration in cases of insolvency (g), or where the party is vergens ad inopiam (h). When pleaded, it operates retrospectively to the period of concurrence, and so stops interest (i).

'The right to compensate passes against assignees, if once vested against the cedent by concurrence before assignation. But there can be no compensation if concurrence is prevented by intimated assignation before the counter debt arises (k).'

I. NOVATION.

576. A debt is extinguished by novation in two several ways: Novation properly so called, and Delegation.

Nature of it.—Novation is the substitution of a new engagement or obligation by the same debtor to the same creditor, to the effect of extinguishing the original debt (a).

(a) 1 Stair, 18. § 8. 3 Ersk. Pr. 4. § 9. 3 Ersk. 4. § 22. Pallet v. Rodgers, 1675; 1 B. Sup. 733. Douglas, Heron, & Co. v. Brown, 1785; M. 7070; Hailes, 979; 1 Ill. 344.

577. Delegation is the substitution of a new debtor for the old, with consent of the creditor. The person thus substituted was in the Roman law called Expromissor (a). 'There is no novation without the assent of three parties,—the original debtor, the new debtor, and the creditor accepting the new debtor and discharging the former obligation (b).'

(a) 1 Stair, 18. § 8. 3 Ersk. Pr. 4. § 9. 3 Ersk. 4. § 22. Hay v. Hall, 1697; M. 11,520; 1 Ill. 344. Clerk v. Broadlees' Crs., 1712; 1 B. Sup. 88. Davidson v. Ranken, 1733; M. 7061; *Elch. (b) Authorities in last note. Cf. Addison on Contracts, 162 sqq.; supra, § 371.

578. Novation not presumed. — Novation 'or delegation' is not to be presumed where the circumstances are consistent with the subsistence of the original debt (a), unless the old security be given up (b), or the new one expressly taken in satisfaction, or a new debtor taken in place of the old. Any other alteration on the security is held to be for the convenience and intermediate security or use of the creditor, and in corroboration of the original engagement; as where the creditor in a book-debt takes a bond or bill for the amount (c).

'In all cases it is a question of fact whether the tripartite agreement to innovate has been entered into (d). In the case of a company or firm subject to change by the retirement of old and the introduction of new partners, comparatively slight evidence is sufficient to show that a customer who continues his dealings with the new firm accepts it as his debtor in place of the old (e). But the amalgamation of one joint-stock company with another is not to be assimilated in this respect to a mere change of partners (f). And on a Life Assurance Company transferring its business to another company, or amalgamating with it, a policy-holder is not deemed to have abandoned his claim against the former company by paying premiums to the latter, or by any other act, or to have accepted in lieu thereof the liability of the transferee company, unless such abandonment and acceptance have been signified by some writing signed by him or his authorised agent (g).'

When the personal obligation under a bond and disposition in security is transmitted by agreement in virtue of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, to a donee of the security subject, the creditor, though no party to the transmission, gets an additional obligant in the donee, and delegation does not take place. 37 and 38 Vict. c. 94, § 47. *Univ. of Glas. v. 579. Effect of Novation.—Novation of either kind extinguishes the debt, with its accessories. But a special stipulation may preserve them; or the old debtor may guarantee the credit of the new. If the old debtor knew, while the creditor was ignorant, that the substituted debtor was insolvent, the original debt will subsist.

II. CONFUSION.

580. Nature of Confusion.—When the same person becomes both creditor and debtor in an obligation, without any right of relief against another, the jus crediti is suspended (a); and if no interest of the creditor interferes to make it desirable to keep up the debt, it is held to be satisfied and extinguished 'confusione' (b).

Where the creditor has an interest to keep up the debt, it is only suspended, not extinguished (c). So the debt may be assigned and money borrowed on it; or it may be kept up for the benefit of children, as by an heir of entail; or, in contemplation of a divergence of the lines of succession, it may be made available to a particular heir; or where the creditor succeeds to the debtor in a character entitled to relief, the debt will not be entirely extinguished, but the right of relief will remain (d). 'It rather seems that where one becomes full and absolute creditor and debtor in the same debt without relief, confusion operates at once and irrevocably, unless by taking an assignation of the debt or security he keeps it up as a separate right (e).'

It is clear that while one who advances money to pay prior charges upon an estate is entitled to have an assignation to these securities, which will be preferable to subsequent securities existing at the date of the assignation; an absolute owner paying up prior securities cannot keep them up for his own benefit against subsequent incumbrances. *Mackenzie v. 581. Operation.—Confusion takes place where the debtor succeeds to the creditor; where the creditor succeeds to the debtor, and to the extent of the right thus arising; where a stranger succeeds to both; where the creditor and debtor intermarry 'previous to July 18, 1881,' and the debt is moveable (a).

III. DISCHARGE.

582. Nature of Discharge.—A discharge is properly the acknowledgment of payment or performance actually made; but it may be granted independently of performance or payment, which is called Acceptilation.

Proof.—Express discharge must be established by evidence equally available with that which constitutes the obligation (a). 'An agreement to discharge mutual debts by setting one against the other must be proved by writ or oath (b).'

Effect.—A discharge extinguishes the debt; but it is frequently combined with an assignation; as, where a cautioner is called upon to pay a debt, he gets from the creditor a discharge of his own obligation, and an assignation of the debt, for the purpose of operating his relief without the necessity of raising an action (c).

(a) Although donation may be proved by parole evidence (supra, § 64), it has not yet been held that a donation which consists in the renunciation or discharge of a debt vouched by writing may be so proved. But when the discharge is effected by delivery and destruction of such a document, parole is competent. Anderson's Trs. v. Webster, 1883; 11 R. 35; where the decision, though put on narrower grounds, might perhaps have been referred to the larger principle now admitted in regard to donation.

583. Construction.—A special discharge, with a general clause superadded, is limited to debts of the same kind with that specially discharged (a).

(a) 3 Ersk. 4. § 9. 1 Stair, 18. § 2. Talbot v. Guydet, 1705; M. 5027; 1 Ill. 347. Logan v. Mitchell, 1797; M. 11,379. Ewen (or Graham) v. Mags. of Montrose, 1824; 2 S. 612; rev. 1825, 1 W. & S. 595; 4 W. & S. 346.

584. The words of a general voluntary discharge include all debts of which, at the date, the granter could demand payment, except those of an extraordinary description; as cautionry, feu-duties, heritable burdens, etc. (a); 'except also claims of which the granter was ignorant, or which he must be presumed not to have contemplated (b). A wider construction is given to a discharge which from its conception is plainly intended to be universal; and so' a general discharge in bankruptcy comprehends all debts of every description, present, future, and contingent, contracted previous to the date of the first deliverance on the petition for sequestration; 'or, in an extrajudicial arrangement, previous to the date of the discharge, or other date specified (c).'

585. Presumed Discharge.—Discharge is presumed, from three consecutive receipts for rents or other periodical payments (a), and from the settlement of a factor's 'or other' periodical accounts (b). 'There is also in many circumstances a presumption of discharge or of payment from mora, or even apart from delay from the relations and actings of parties (c).'

		635. Decennial Prescription of Tutorial Accounts.

586. Distinction between Limitation and Prescription.—The mere lapse of time in some cases bars action on an obligation; in others, it extinguishes the obligation entirely. But in order correctly to mark the principle on which this doctrine proceeds, it is necessary to distinguish between Limitation properly speaking, and what more correctly is called Prescription. Limitation is a denial of action on an instrument or document of debt, after the lapse of a certain time, without regard to the actual subsistence of the debt; as in holograph writings, bonds of caution, bills and notes. Prescription is a legal presumption of abandonment or of satisfaction, and so extinguishes the debt; as in the long negative prescription, the decennial, quinquennial, and triennial prescriptions. This distinction is grounded on a real difference in principle; and although it may seem unimportant, it enters into all arguments on the more nice and difficult questions in this department.

I. LIMITATION.

587. Limitation of action is either by convention or by statute; the former being a condition in the obligation, the latter established on grounds of public expediency.

588. Conventional Limitation depends entirely on the will of the parties. Thus—

An obligation stipulated to be binding for a certain time, is extinguished by the lapse of that time; as an obligation to guarantee a loan during six months; or an obligation to pay a sum of money, provided a demand shall be made within a year; or to pay an annuity during a certain term of years. In such stipulations it is important to observe the distinction between engagements to endure for a certain time, and engagements for collateral matters to take effect provisionally within a time certain. The expiration of the limited time extinguishes the one; it only points the application of the other.

An obligation may be limited to a particular event (as the provision of a sum on A.'s attaining a certain age); in which case by predecease the obligation is extinguished, the condition becoming impossible. Obligations are also sometimes specially limited to the person of the debtor or of the creditor; in which case the death of the party, or incapacity to perform the thing undertaken, will extinguish the right and discharge the obligation. So an obligation by an artist to paint a picture, or an agreement to give the use of a thing to one during life, or an obligation to pay an annuity during life, expires with the life of the person.

589. Statutory Limitation.—The laws by which the effect of written obligations is limited to a certain term, proceed on the obvious expediency of protecting persons against demands after the ordinary checks against forgery may have been removed; or against the consequences of too easily putting their hand to cautionary engagements after so transitory an act may have been forgotten. There are statutes of this description establishing the vicennial, the quinquennial, the sexennial, and the septennial limitations.

590. Vicennial Limitation.—By statute, “holograph missive letters, and holograph bonds, and subscriptions in compt-books without witnesses, not being pursued for within twenty years, shall prescribe in all time thereafter, except the pursuer offer to prove by the defender’s oath the verity of the said holograph bonds, and letters, and subscriptions in compt-books” (a). The statute seems to contemplate only contracts or obligations; and it ‘was’ doubted whether it is to be held as quite settled by the case below (b), that a writing not itself an obligation, but a collateral proof merely, falls under the Act. ‘It is now settled that it extends to all holograph writs on which an obligation can be founded, e.g. a receipt for money (c). Its operation is excluded by action raised within the twenty years (d); or probably by pleading compensation (e); or by such recognition after the twenty years as may be held to raise a personal exception against the defender pleading the statute (f).’

(a) Home v. Donaldson, 1773; M. 10,992; Hailes, 511; 1 Ill. 348. See Wyse v. Wyse, cit.

592. After the lapse of the statutory period, the authenticity of the writing, not that of the subscription merely, ‘but not, in order to exclude the prescription, the subsistence of the obligation (a),’ must be established by the debtor’s oath, or that of his heir (b); and in that case it is not necessary to prove the debt (c).

The vicennial prescription does not run against a minor (d).

(d) 1669, c. 9 in fin. See Gray v. Fotheringham, 1700; M. 10,987.

593. Quinquennial Limitation.—By statute, “all bargains concerning moveables, or sums of money provable by witnesses, shall only be provable by writ or oath of party, if the same be not pursued for within five years after the making of the bargain” (a). Under this limitation are comprehended sales of moveables, and the contracts of hiring, loan, deposit, pledge (b), ‘if not constituted by writ (c).’ But it has been held not to apply to a consignment of goods not being a sale, or account of furnishings, ‘or any accounting between agent and principal’ (d). It has sometimes been held that actions raised on holograph writings fall under the quinquennial prescription of the Act, 1685, c. 14, and on this Erskine (e) speaks ambiguously. There does not appear to be any ground for such an opinion in either of the statutes. ‘After the five years, both the subsistence and the constitution of the debt must be proved by the debtor’s writ or oath (f).’

594. Sexennial Limitation.—This is, strictly speaking, a statutory limitation of action (a), by which no bill of exchange, or inland bill, or promissory-note, “shall be of force or effectual to produce any diligence or action in Scotland, unless such diligence shall be raised and executed, or action commenced thereon, within the space of six years from and after the term at which the sums in the said bills and notes become exigible.” But it is provided “that it shall be lawful and competent at any time after the expiration of the said six years, in either of the cases mentioned, to prove the debt contained in the bill or note, and that the same is resting owing, by the oath or writ of the debtor.” “The years of minority of the creditor are not to be reckoned” (b).

595. (1.) The terminus a quo is the time at which the debt is exigible (a). This is the last day of grace in bills and notes at a fixed term (b); the date of the bill itself, if payable on demand (c).

In bills and notes at sight, the point ‘was’ left unsettled: it ‘could’ not be till presentment, and the safe course ‘was’ to hold the presentment of the bill to be the terminus a quo (d). ‘But now a bill payable at sight or on presentation is a bill payable on demand (e); and so the terminus a quo is the date of the bill, at least if that be the date of issue (f). But in bills payable at a certain period after demand or notice, time runs from expiry of that period (g).’
